"He's gone, yes!" The stranger woman's voice held a new note, the hand that she stretched out to Marcia Allen was kind and understanding. "He's gone, but there's every chance that he'll come back! And now, on Thanksgiving day, you'll know that you've given something to the country that made Thanksgiving possible! I was crying, there in the park, from sheer loneliness—because everyone else had some one, even if it's only some one to send, while you—why, you can clasp hands across the centuries with the Pilgrim mother who sailed an unknown sea. . . . I only wish," half-sobbed the stranger woman, "that I had a son to give!"

Somewhere, in one of the other rooms, a clock struck seven. It was a jingly little clock, a clock that Boy had bought because of its pleasant chime.

The stranger woman rose suddenly to her feet.

"They," she said, and Marcia Allen knew, with a sudden thrill of pity, that "they" meant the cook and the irreproachable butler, "they will be hunting for me. I must get back to my house, across the park."

"You'll never know," all at once Marcia Allen heard herself speaking, "what you've done for me. You've given me a new viewpoint—a new angle on life. I want to see you again. Why"—her voice faltered—"why can't you spend the day with me tomorrow?"

"I'd like to," said the stranger woman simply. But her eyes said much more.

IT was later in the evening that Marcia Allen again stood at the window and looked out over the little park. Somehow it didn't seem as lonely as it had seemed. Perhaps it was because the lamps had been lighted—somehow they made even the bare trees into a fairy lattice-work—perhaps it was because . . .

"Thanksgiving," said Marcia Allen softly, and aloud. "Why, tomorrow will be Thanksgiving. And no matter where Boy is, I know that there'll be something of him—here. He was always," said Marcia Allen—"such a home boy!"

Over across a sea there were dark rows of trenches and darker stretches of No-Man's Land, and here and there a tangle that might have been barbed wire, and here and there a heap that might— But the yellow candlelight, playing across Boy's photograph in its silver frame, made it seem to smile. Marcia Allen, with a nearly regal gesture, threw up her head and smiled proudly, gladly, thankfully back at it.

It was late autumn. The park was cold and windswept—the park that had been so warm and friendly. And yet the moon, creeping up from behind the city, threw a glow of happiness over it.

It was late autumn and cold. And yet, in the heart of Marcia Allen, there was the promise of an early spring.

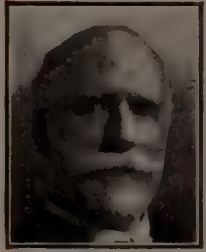
The CHRISTIAN HERALD for 1918

Evangelist Wm. A. Sunday

Rev. S. Parkes Cadman, D.D.

Rev. J. Wilbur Chapman
Moderator Presbyterian Church

Pastor Junius B. Remensnyder, D.D.



Rev. R. A. Torrey, D.D.

It has been said of the Christian Herald that it is not only a leading record of Christian progress but a leading force in it. The Christian Herald strives earnestly to be deserving of this high esteem and we approach the new year with confidence that, under God's leading, this paper will continue to be more than ever a welcome visitor in the homes of America. During the past year the Christian Herald has continued its world-wide activities, which for so many years have given it an international standing.

The Christian Herald Widows and Orphans Fund, established shortly after the beginning of the war in Europe, continued its humane ministry and has greatly extended its territory.

In over forty different fields, our Christian missions have been materially helped and spiritually energized by the gifts of the members of our nation-wide Circle. In fact, there is hardly a single notable project in missions or philanthropy, at home or abroad, which has not benefited by the generosity of our readers.

When America entered the great war, our Family Circle had a new mission before it. Our new national army—the flower of America's young manhood—needed the Gospel, and the response to a call to "put a New Testament in every soldier's kit and sailor's bag" was prompt and generous, and the work is still going on magnificently. Many a mother's boy at the home camps, or in the trenches in France, is now finding comfort in his hours of loneliness, or of temptation, in reading the Christian Herald Testament.

God has been good to our land, in spite of the fact that war has drawn into its vortex the Western World, as well as Europe and the East. We are mindful of His mercies at all times. To show their appreciation of His blessings upon this nation, the American people have poured out their resources like water, and the Family Circle, as usual, has been nowise behind in its generosity. It has given patriotically and with lavish hand to all the worthy enterprises in connection with the war, not only those of the National Government, but for the work of the Red Cross, the Y. M. C. A., and other organizations for the benefit of the soldiers and sailors. We can say with absolute truthfulness and gratification, that the Christian Herald Family has loyally "done its bit."

We have many attractive features in preparation for 1918, some of which are set forth in the following pages, and all of which will be found up to the high-water mark in interest and spiritual value.

In all great religious movements the Christian Herald will be at the forefront. Leading clergymen and laymen of all the denominations are unfailing sources of accurate information regarding every important activity.

All the big public movements will be faithfully analyzed and recorded. Inside facts will be presented by eminent specialists. Every event of world-wide human interest will be made clearly comprehensible.

"Our Editorial Forum" has gained new talent and spirit, and the discussion of all editorial topics, spiritual and secular, will be high-minded, whole-souled and warm-hearted.

Our Sermonic Department has been reinforced by new and notable additions, and all the denominations will receive representation, for the Christian Herald Family regards all as members of the great Household of Faith.

We need hardly say that we hope to retain every member of the Christian Herald Family during the coming year, and to have them bring into the fold a host of new friends, who will share with them in all godly enterprises, and rejoice with us in the advancement of Christ's Kingdom on earth.

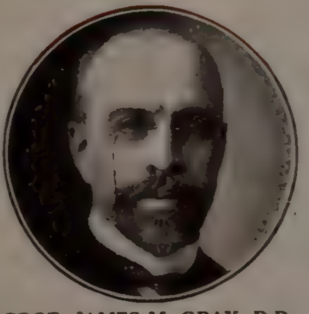
Prophecy and the World War

In these days of universal tribulation, the world has been looking for some authoritative voice to speak. It looked not for a Prophet, but for an Interpreter of the Prophets—for one who, by reason of his eminence in the study of God's Word, could speak and command attention; one of whose Christianity there could be no doubt.

Now, at the crisis, a fearless Expositor has appeared. In the articles contributed by Dr. Gray to the Christian Herald, the great prophetic themes are dealt with by the master hand of a consecrated writer, whose interpretations are made in the spirit of inspiration. He shows convincingly that we are living in the days of prophetic fulfilment. His expositions include almost every vital question that has arisen in the minds of thoughtful readers who have given serious study to the Scriptures. What are those vital questions? Here are some of them:

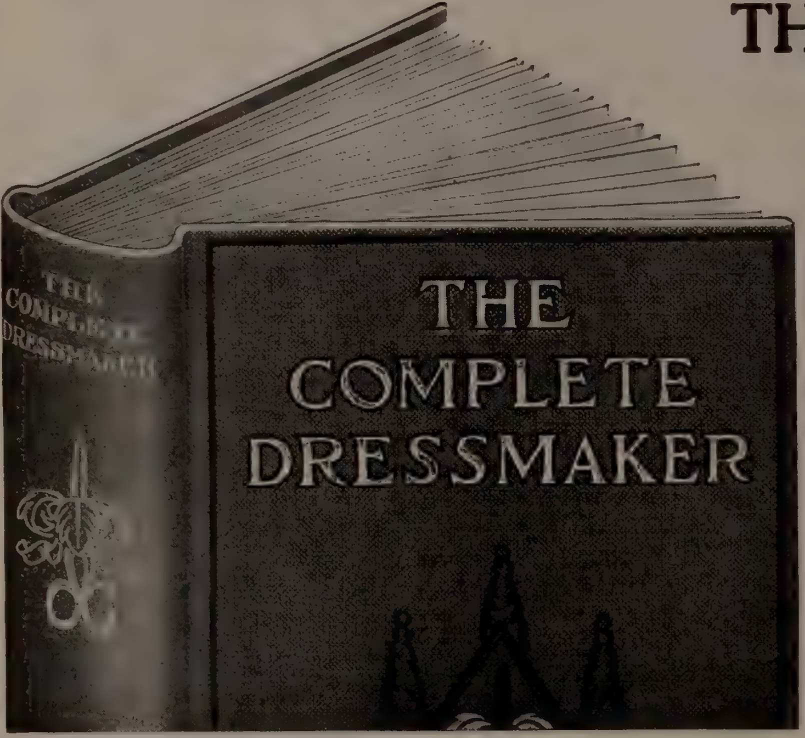


PROF. JAMES M. GRAY, D.D.

Who is Antichrist?
What is meant by "The Kingdom"?
What is the Restoration, and when?
What is the Restitution?
Is Germany an agent in Prophecy?
Is Russia identified in Prophecy?
Is Turkey assigned a rôle in Prophecy?
Is this War to end in Armageddon?
When will the "Times of the Gentiles" end?
When will the Lost Tribes return?
What shall be the fate of Papal Rome?
What of the Millennium, and when?
What of the Parousia?
What of the Resurrection?
Are the Anglo-Saxon nations identified in Prophecy?
What is the "End of the Age"?
How is the present war related to Prophecy?
Has the United States a place in Prophecy?
What is the true teaching concerning the Second Coming?
Which nation or power is prophetic Babylon?

These are only a few of the many questions that arise in prophetic study. Dr. Gray will deal ably and clearly with them in forthcoming issues of the Christian Herald.

Other able interpreters of prophecy will also contribute articles that are certain to command wide attention. Among these are: Col. W. R. Adams, Larned, Kans., E. R. Carswell, Greencastle, Ind., Rev. C. W. Stevenson, Clio, Mich., and several others who have given careful and reverent study to the whole subject of prophecy.



THE COMPLETE DRESSMAKER

EVERY woman wants to be well dressed. How many times have you said "I wish I could make my own clothes"! The necessity of knowing how to make one's own dresses and hats is becoming more evident every day. Learn to make your own dresses and you will have more dresses and better material and for less money than ever before. This home dressmaking course is by Mary I. McIntyre, Instructor of Professional Dressmaking at Pratt Institute, Brooklyn, N. Y., one of the most successful schools of Domestic Science and Arts in this country. The home millinery course, which is also included, is by Mme. Anna Ben-Yusuf, Instructor of Millinery at Pratt Institute.

Bear in mind these courses do not deal with styles. They show in simple language and clear illustrations how to fashion your frock or suit or hat along the most modish lines.

These money-saving, satisfaction-giving courses are by the highest authorities, practical, and the instructions are easily understood. It tells you how

To patch and mend garments
To select garment materials
To do plain sewing

THE WICKED JOHN GOODE

FEW autobiographies published in recent years and dealing with the miracle of grace which transforms the heart and life of the sinner have attracted more attention or elicited more cordial approval than "The Wicked John Goode," which is published in book form and may now be had in connection with a subscription to the Christian Herald.

The very brutality, the seemingly hopeless criminality, in the life of this man, ending at last in his regeneration and the wonderful work he is now doing, stamp the tale as one of the most remarkable stories yet told. Not even the life of Jerry McAuley was more vivid nor of greater encouragement in the end to those who have fallen by the wayside.

It is our wish that every Christian person be made acquainted with the contents of this book. We have already received hundreds of letters of commendation and many persons are buying the book to present it to others whom they think it will uplift. The man's life from the time he was a boy-thief, through the vicissitudes attendant upon his terms in reformatories, in jails, in penitentiaries, until that memorable night when he entered the Bowery Mission and was saved, his struggles to fight and to overcome temptation, followed by his wonderful testimonies for Christ and his great work as a mission leader—here is a wonderful human document, a sermon that should be carefully heeded by all Christians. Here is what one subscriber wrote us:

"I have just finished reading the story of 'The Wicked John Goode.' What a mighty struggle with the demon drink, rising and falling, again and again, at last gaining the victory, by the grace of God, through the instrumentality of Dr. Hallimond and the other noble men who took him by the hand, calling him 'brother,' patiently bearing with his backslidings and not casting him off as a hopeless case! Surely there will be stars in their crowns for their noble work!"

We will send a copy of "The Wicked John Goode," postpaid, together with the Christian Herald for one year, for............... $$2^{35}$

AFTER DEATH, WHAT?

By Rev. Madison C. Peters

WHEN the late Dr. Klopsch published "After Death, What?" some years ago, the book was received with tremendous enthusiasm and the editions published by him were soon exhausted. Successive editions were not published, yet the demand through the intervening years has been large. For this reason, we have thought it wise to bring out an entirely new edition of this wonderful book.

It is impossible to give more than the briefest glimpses of the rich character of the contents of this attractive volume. Among the subjects discussed are: "Does Death End All?" "Light After Darkness," "The Soul between Death and the Resurrection," "Heavenly Reunions," "The Joy and Comfort of Faith in Immortality," "Occupations in Heaven," "Our Children in Heaven," and many others, including poems of comfort and master minds on the life beyond. In addition to the above masterpieces of thought and literature, it contains a vast collection of golden gems from the greatest historians, philosophers, preachers and poets of all ages and nationalities on other phases of the future life.

Whether Dr. Madison C. Peters, the author, has looked into heaven with his own eyes we know not; but in this substantial and handsome volume he sees and makes his readers see the beauties of the cloudless land; in a singularly lucid, logically simple yet scholarly manner he treats of and discusses questions that have agitated deeply thinking men and women from time immemorial. This book will prove a comfort and solace to those who mourn the loss of some dear one and a veritable inspiration to other thoughtful men and women searching the great mysteries of the great hereafter.

We will send a copy of "After Death, What?" postpaid, together with the Christian Herald for one year, for.............. $$2^{35}$

Or, we will send a copy to present subscribers as a reward for sending us one new yearly subscription to the Christian Herald with.. $$2^{00}$

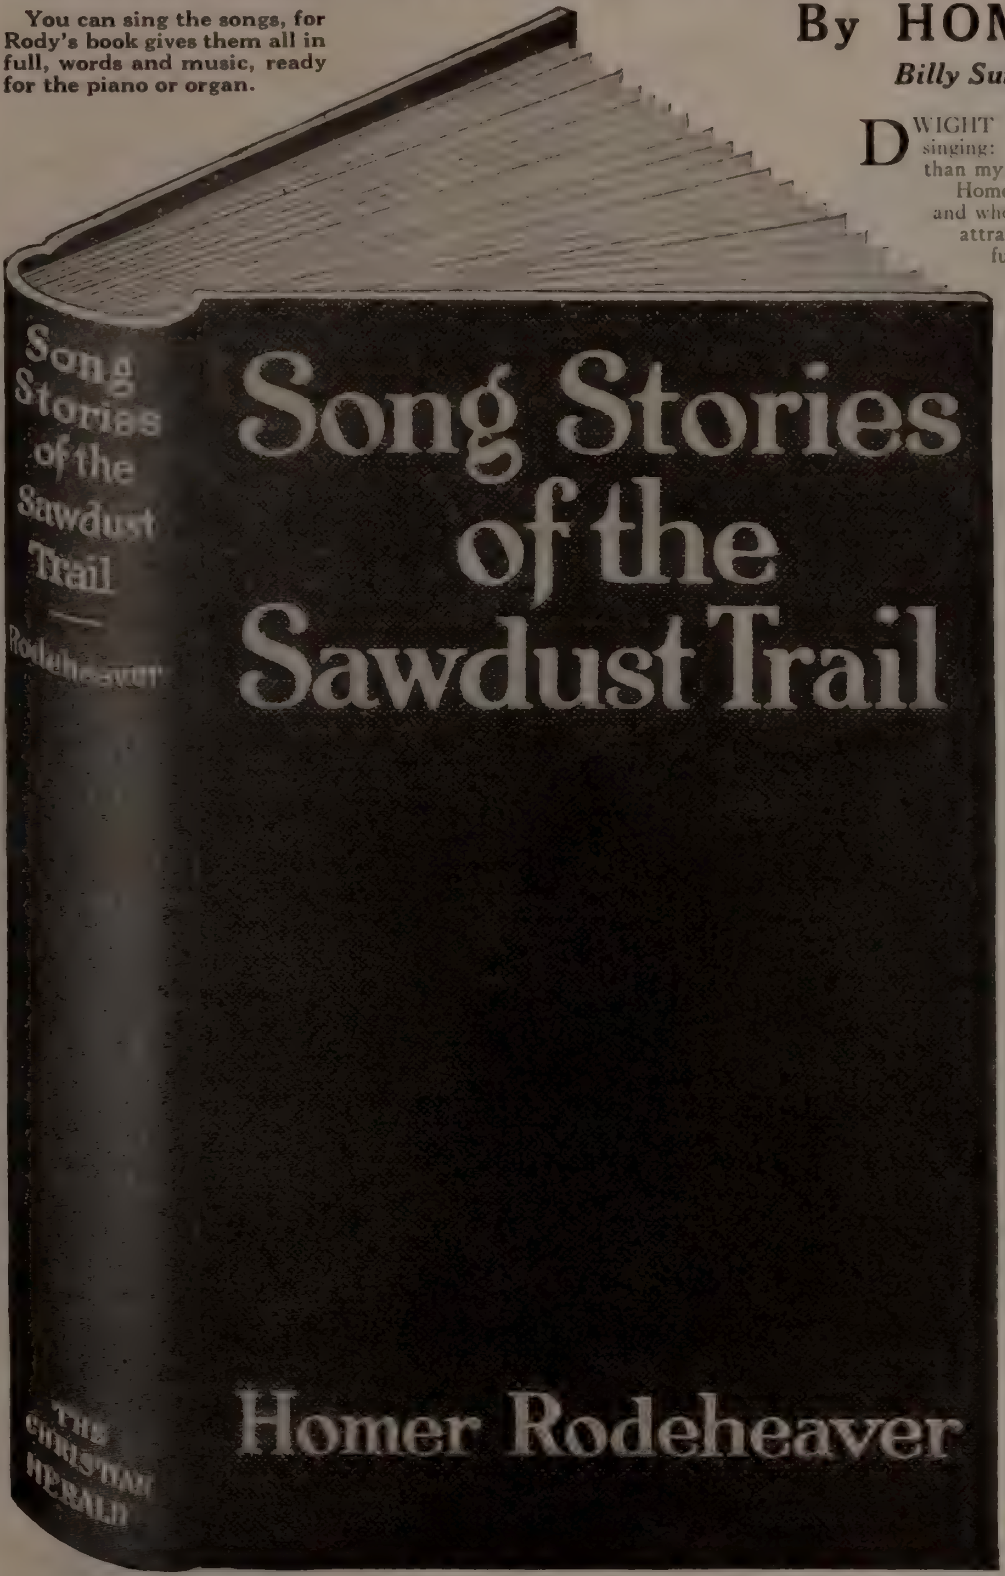
SONG STORIES OF THE SAWDUST TRAIL

By HOMER RODEHEAVER

Billy Sunday's Tabernacle Choir Leader

You can sing the songs, for Rody's book gives them all in full, words and music, ready for the piano or organ.



Song Stories of the Sawdust Trail
Homer Rodeheaver
Song Stories of the Sawdust Trail
Rodeheaver
The Christian Herald

DWIGHT L. MOODY, the greatest evangelist of his day, used to say of Sankey's singing: "It is a question in my mind whether Ira's songs don't win more souls than my preaching."

Homer Rodeheaver, who, as everybody knows, is Billy Sunday's choir leader, and who has a wonderful gift like that of Sankey, has written a book with the attractive title "Song Stories of the Sawdust Trail," to which Billy has furnished this glowing preface:

> "It is a pleasure to endorse the songs of Homer Rodeheaver. They have reclaimed, and redeemed, and remade the lives of thousands of men and women. The effort to tell, in human story form, the experiences of new birth that have resulted from these songs in his book, "The Song Stories of the Sawdust Trail," should do a tremendous service for the Kingdom."
> W. A. SUNDAY."

Who can measure the power of Gospel Song to win hearts for the world's Redeemer? "Rody" in his book tells the story of his most famous songs—of which the words and music are familiar to hundreds of thousands of Americans who have listened with eagerness and delight to his singing and who have joined in the choruses. And each song has an individual history of its own. He tells how a humble, homekeeping woman, striving to "do something" for God, made herself and multitudes of others happy by writing the four simple, touching verses which the world knows as "Brighten the Corner Where You Are," and which radiate the finest kind of practical Christian teaching. He relates how another song, "My Father Watches Over Me," sung at a mission service, called a poor, sin-sick criminal and wanderer back to Christ and happiness. "Molly and the Baby," another of Rody's favorites, won a poor struggling drunkard back from his cups, and his evil associations, to his wife and family, and how all his former happiness was restored.

The Story of the Millionaire

Very dramatic and touching is the story of the song, "His Love is Far Better than Gold." A millionaire at sixty lost his fortune in speculation. All his beloved wealth, his idol and his god, was gone irretrievably. The crash of his fall shook the market. He went insane and wandered from city to city, a beggar. One day the conviction came to his clouded mind that there was something more precious than gold. He couldn't tell what it was, however. Passing a mission, he heard a voice singing words that almost seemed like a divine answer to his heart's question. He entered, and listened to the song to the end. The vision had come. God touched his heart, and step by step he won back position, influence, wealth, but all were now consecrated.

There are many other songs, each of which Rodeheaver invests with a history of its own. Among them are "Counting the Cost," "If Your Heart Keeps Right," "Mother's Prayers," "Sweeter As the Years Go By," and "I Walk With the King." One that has a unique history is "The Brewers' Big Horses"—the simplest and homeliest of the lot, and the most amusing. You'll laugh with delight as you read how the brewers' horses and their driver, under orders from the brewers themselves, did actually try to break up a parade given in honor of the evangelist, and what happened.

You want to know these Gospel Songs and their stories, as Rody tells them. They have helped uncounted thousands; they will help you. Truth is stranger than fiction and the story of each song is a drama from real life, told in vivid yet simple language, that alternately grips and thrills us as we read. And through them all runs the tender chord of divine love and forgiveness, drawing the heart of the sinner to Christ.

We will send a copy of "Song Stories of the Sawdust Trail," postpaid, together with the Christian Herald for one year, for........................ $2.40

Or, we will send a copy to present subscribers as a reward for sending us one new yearly subscription to the Christian Herald with $2.00

Human Stories from Russia

MAYNARD OWEN WILLIAMS

CORRESPONDENTS, like poets, are born, not made. Maynard Owen Williams, whose articles appear exclusively in the Christian Herald, has the born correspondent's ability to observe and the capacity to understand something of the genius of the people among whom he is. More than that, he has the sympathetic attitude of a sincere Christian, and a vital Christian love for truth. Having observed and understood, he can so tell it that the rest of us also see and understand.

Do you want to know how the Russian Church, deprived of the protection of autocracy, is meeting the challenge of democracy? Williams will tell you in the Christian Herald.

Do you want to see the Great Russian Council, yet to be called, build a people's government on the shattered foundations of a Czar's authority? Williams will show you in the Christian Herald.

Do you want to understand the mind and heart of the Slav, feared as a menace by so many generations of western Europeans, now leading them all in his devotion to Liberty and the rights of men? Williams will make it plain in the Christian Herald.

At the time of the Russian Revolution. Mr. Williams was in China completing his articles about the Orient for the Christian Herald. He went to Petrograd at once. From Harbin, the far Eastern port, Mr. Williams sent several articles which have helped the readers of the Christian Herald to understand the new Russia.

Mr. Williams' articles alone, during the coming year, will be worth many times the cost of the Christian Herald.

Greater United States

FRANK G. CARPENTER

IN every Chautauqua Association and in nearly every town and village of the United States, Frank G. Carpenter is known as the man who can come back from some place and then tell about it so that you think you have been there. After going into all the odd corners of the world, Mr. Carpenter has now turned his steps toward the farms and factories of his native land. Already he has told stories in the Christian Herald of steel and cotton, of sugar and of sulphur, of oil and lumber, and he has only just made a beginning. This exceedingly interesting series of articles, under the title of The Greater United States, appears regularly in the Christian Herald.

Mr. Carpenter is making studies of our farms, factories, and mines from the standpoint of efficiency and industrial preparedness, and will make careful investigations of the wealth and resources of the United States, telling in the Christian Herald how they may be mobilized in times of need.

The aim of these travels is to learn just what we have in resources and industry, and how they may be protected, developed, and made most efficient for the American people.

Mr. Carpenter is making extensive travels throughout the United States, covering the great agricultural and industrial centers. He is taking up the great industries and is showing the new things that are taking place in them, especially drugs, dyes, etc. These articles deal with New England, with the newest South with its iron and sulphur, cotton and chemicals, and with the bread and meat lands of the Mississippi Valley. He will show what is going on in and about the Great Lakes, including the vast iron mines on which our manufacturing industry is founded.

Mr. Carpenter will visit and tell about the fast-growing Southwest, the Northwest and the Pacific Slope.

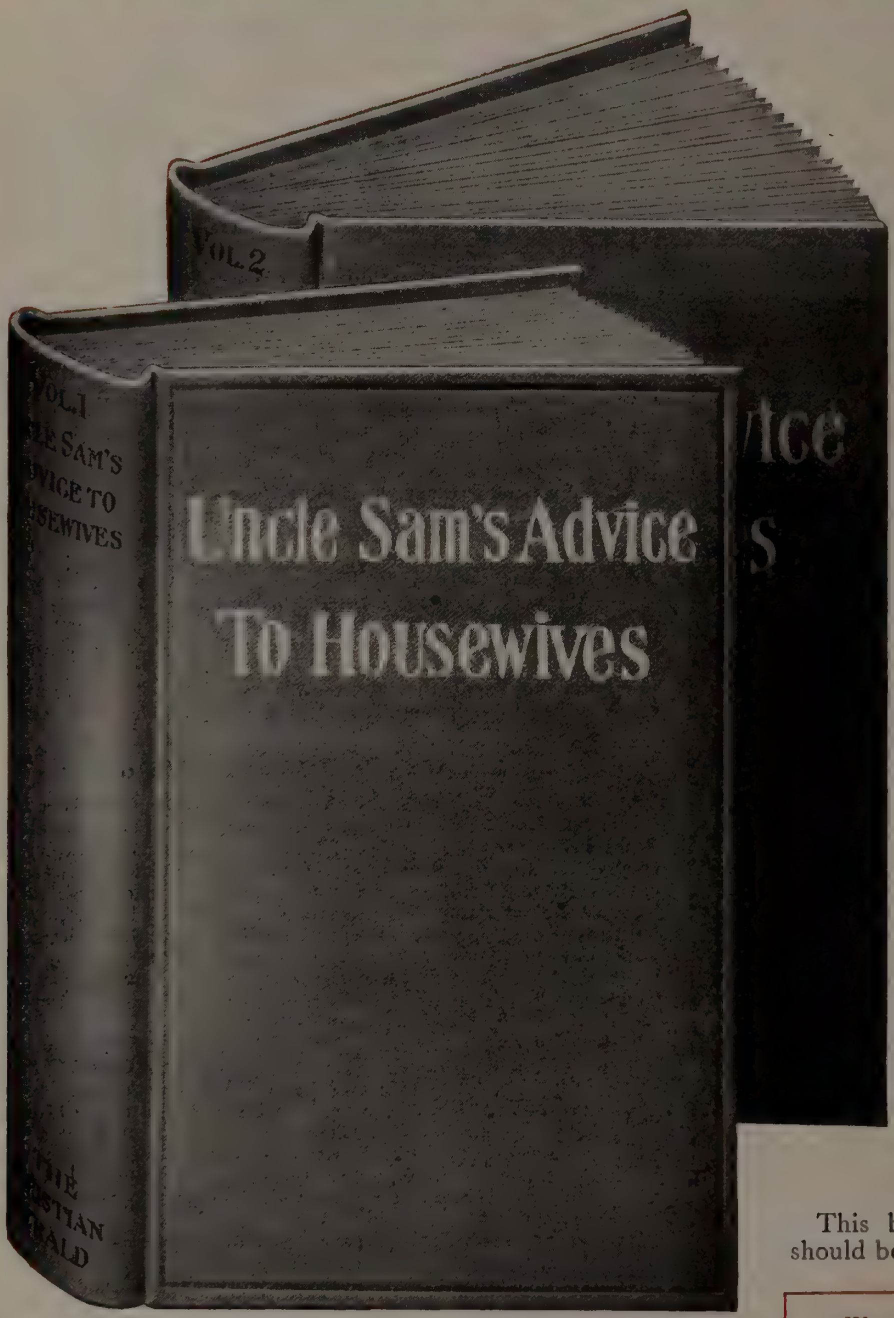
UNCLE SAM'S ADVICE TO HOUSEWIVES



VOL. 2
Advice
VOL. 1
UNCLE SAM'S ADVICE TO HOUSEWIVES
THE CHRISTIAN HERALD
Uncle Sam's Advice To Housewives

Two Splendid Volumes

Written by United States Government Experts Telling You How to Prepare Better Food at the Cheapest Possible Cost

Approved by the United States Department of Agriculture and the United States Food Administration

FOR many years the United States Government has been employing experts to study the most economical methods of preparing foods with a view to telling the housewives all over the country how to get the most for their money.

The result of these investigations has been printed in pamphlets issued by the Government. But no general collection has ever been made until this one, which has the approval of the United States Department of Agriculture and of Herbert Hoover's Food Administration. The facts are therefore authoritative.

If any housewife will carefully read these volumes she will not only be able to save money and provide better food for her own household, but she will be directly helping the United States Government in its endeavor to conserve the food resources of the nation.

It Is More Than a Cook Book

At first we thought of calling it the Government Cook Book, but it is more than that, as witness the following partial list of contents, which include many recipes:

Lessons on Food Conservation
Fresh Fruits and Other Staple Foods
The Home Vegetable Garden
Drying Fruits and Vegetables
Home Storage of Vegetables and Eggs
Economical Use of Meat in the Home
Bread and Bread Making in the Home
Home-made Fireless Cookers and Their Use Food for Young Children
What the Body Needs
Care of Food in the Home
Home Canning of Fruits and Vegetables
Preservation of Vegetables
Preservation of Vegetables for the Table
Corn Meal as a Food
Cheese and Its Economical Use in the Diet
School Lunches

This book is the most authoritative word on home economics, and it should be in constant use in every household.

ENDORSEMENT BY HERBERT HOOVER'S FOOD ADMINISTRATION

October 11, 1917.

"The Christian Herald, in gathering together in book form [a number of the important bulletins of the Department of Agriculture, together with 'Ten Lessons on Food Conservation,' published by the United States Food Administration, is performing a distinct service in the present emergency."

(Signed) UNITED STATES FOOD ADMINISTRATION.

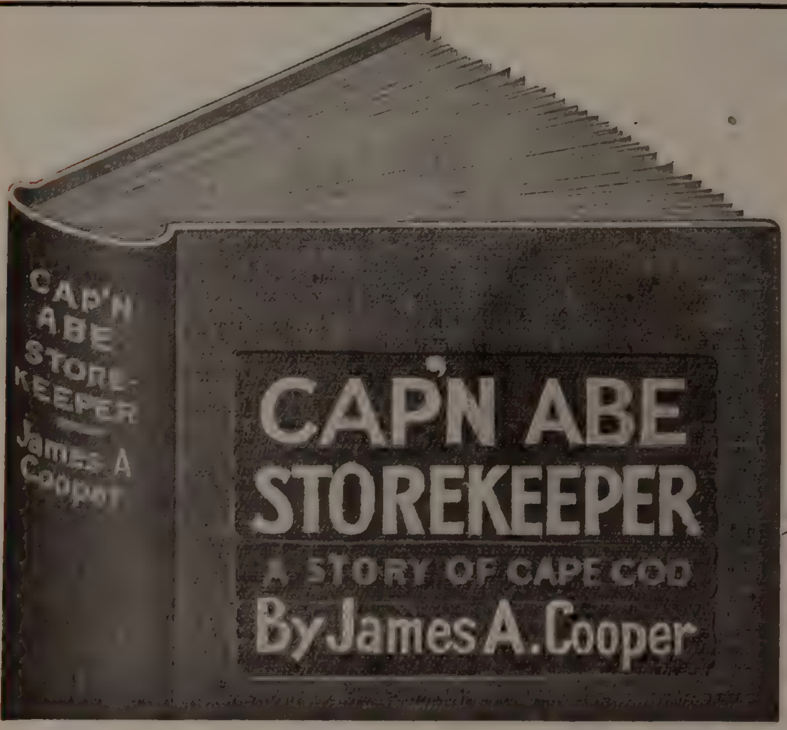
Cap'n Abe, Storekeeper

A Cape Cod Story by James A. Cooper



DO you like to read about doings on Cape Cod, among the quaint characters who inhabit that locality?

Would you like to read of what happened to a high-bred city girl when she suddenly landed down there to take up her living with a relative she had never seen?

Would you like to read how loquacious Cap'n Abe, the storekeeper, who could tell more marvelous yarns than any other man on the Cape, suddenly disappeared, and of how his brother from "furrin parts" appeared to take his place?

Would you like to read about a most perplexing mystery that came near being turned into a tragedy, and of how a man who was a rank coward at heart forced himself to play the part of a hero?

In this volume, humor and pathos are well mixed. Many of the doings along the Cape shore are taken from life. Tender love scenes are not lacking; and there is high excitement when a great storm wrecks a vessel off the coast and it looks as if some of the loved ones might be drowned.

To meet Cap'n Abe, is never to forget him.

We will send a copy of "Cap'n Abe, Storekeeper," postpaid, together with the Christian Herald for one year, for $2.50

Or, we will send a copy to present subscribers as a reward for sending us one new yearly subscription to the Christian Herald with $2.00

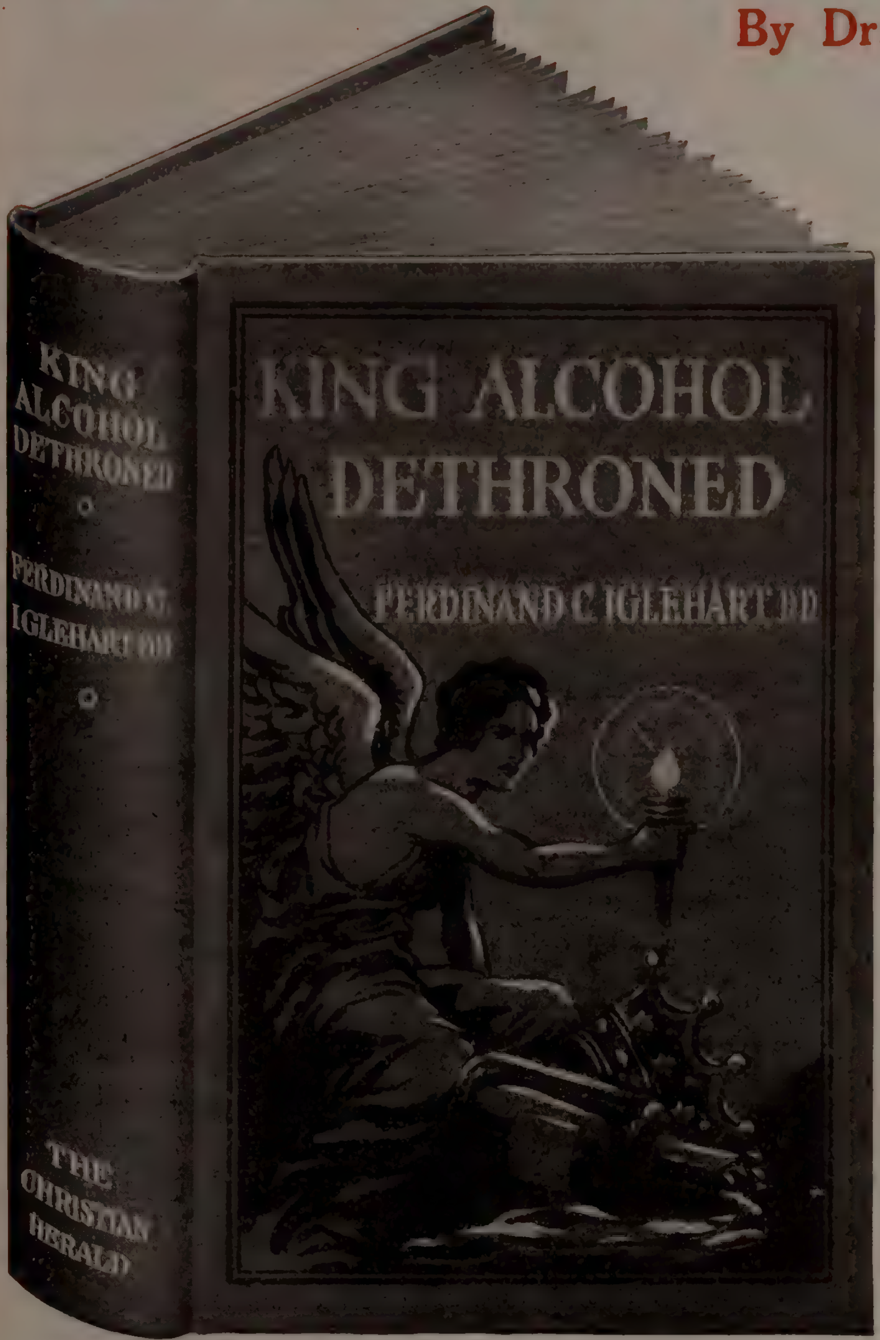
"KING ALCOHOL DETHRONED"

By Dr. FERDINAND C. IGLEHART



THIS is a live-wire book on one of the livest questions of the day. It comes opportunely at a time when the Drink Problem is focusing the attention of all right-thinking, sane people, and when the American nation is about to decide whether an evil which has afflicted the world all too long should not be wholly abolished, and the United States made a sober nation, through Congressional enactment, with the full approval of three-fourths of the States. The growth of public sentiment in favor of National Prohibition, and the impending struggle in Congress, which is likely to determine the question, combine to make the publication of "KING ALCOHOL DETHRONED" an event of unusual importance, as it has a direct bearing upon the health, morals, prosperity, and happiness of the fathers, mothers, and children of this nation.

To the readers of the Christian Herald the whole subject is one of vital interest. Heart and soul for temperance, they would rejoice to see the rule of King Alcohol brought to an end forever. We believe they will welcome Dr. Iglehart's book as a mighty aid in carrying the war against Drink in all its forms to a successful issue. Here is a battery which needs no camouflage of concealment. The fighting is in the open, and Dr. Iglehart's book brings all the big guns to bear on the enemy.

A Nation in Revolt Against Drink

Dr. Iglehart's book tells the whole story of the nation's revolt against Drink, from the beginning up to the present time. It is a masterly presentation, so complete in every detail that it is equivalent to a whole library on the subject. He has enlisted the aid of the men who are foremost today in all the sciences, and in every leading line of business, in setting forth the successive steps through which our nation is becoming emancipated from strong drink. There is hardly an American of prominence in any line of activity, hardly a name that carries weight in legislation or on the public platform, nor yet a single writer of ability in dealing with the subject, who has not made personal contributions to this wonderful book. Most of the Governors and Senators of all the "dry" States are represented here, telling how Prohibition is stamping out the evils caused by Drink, and bringing in Prosperity.

Roosevelt, Bryan, Choate Enthusiastic

Colonel Roosevelt—a whole battalion in himself—deals sledge-hammer blows in the good cause with his tremendous "punch." William Jennings Bryan, a long-time champion of Prohibition; the late Joseph Choate, brilliant and epigrammatic; Governor Capper of Kansas; Ex-Governor Foss of Massachusetts; the heads of the steel, railroad and mining corporations, and hundreds of others of like commanding influence, are among the contributors to this remarkable volume.

Nor is the splendid part the women of America have played in the campaign overlooked. Dr. Iglehart has brought to bear the best talent of both sexes, and the result is a book which should be in every American household.

After reading it in the manuscript, the editor of the Christian Herald strongly urges every reader of this journal to procure a copy for use in his home, and to bring it to the attention of every friend whom he desires to influence for good. To Church and Social Reform organizations, Sunday Schools, Christian Endeavor, and other societies, it is one of the very best volumes that they could use in practical Christian work.

We will send a copy of "King Alcohol Dethroned," postpaid, together with the Christian Herald for one year, for $2.40

Or, we will send a copy to present subscribers as a reward for sending us one new yearly subscription to the Christian Herald with.. $2.00

New Novel by Pastor Sheldon

REV. CHARLES M. SHELDON, D.D., Pastor
Author of "In His Steps"

DR. SHELDON, the famous Kansas clergyman, has established for himself wide and growing popularity as an author through such gripping and enduring books as "In His Steps" and "Jesus Is Here."

"Howard Chase"

a new novel by Dr. Sheldon, will appear exclusively in the beginning with December 12th issue

CHRISTIAN HERALD

Dr. Sheldon's new novel seems to us to surpass all of his previous works in thrilling human interest and moral power. It is a story of a big man in a small town.

"Howard Chase" is a church story, but intensely human and dealing unsparingly with the follies and foibles of church members in their church, community and domestic lives.

The scene of the story is somewhere in Kansas—a town of 700 people and four churches. The theme is the creation of a community spirit in a gossipy, narrow, self-centered and self-satisfied little town.

The leading character, Howard Chase, is the kind of man whom men admire or hate, and whom women love or slander. It is a thrilling, inspiring, soul-cleansing story of high motives, rapid action, love, humor and pathos.

There is much that is charming and humorous and intensely human in the whole of this story by the pastor-author.

"Howard Chase" will be published serially in the Christian Herald. It may eventually be published in book form, but subscribers to the Christian Herald will be able to read it without one cent of extra expense. Dr. Sheldon's new story alone is well worth the subscription price of the Christian Herald.

Margaret E. Sangster's Department

MARGARET E. SANGSTER

THE SINGER IN THE SUNSHINE

"Sunshine in the morning,
When songs are all unsung;
When Life is all before us,
And all the world is young."

This stanza, from one of her own poems, is the keynote to Margaret Sangster's philosophy of life. She is the interpreter of the pure Joy of Living, and there is the fragrance of woodlands and gardens, the hint of birdsongs and sunbeams and wholesome pleasures in all she writes.

Margaret Sangster has made friends of the entire Christian Herald Family Circle. She is the counsellor of young folks without number and of a good many who are still youthful in heart although the years may creep on apace; for she has the spirit of kindliness and sympathy in large measure in all she says and writes and thinks. Her page on which appears regularly in the

"Women and Their Ways"

is an open forum for the sex, in which they discuss with absolute freedom intimate home and personal problems, whether they deal with conduct, friendships, amusements, or the things that belong to the deeper philosophy of life. She has a wise head on young shoulders and seems to possess in extraordinary measure the gift of touching the secret heart-strings.

As an organizer in all kinds of feminine enterprises we do not know her equal. During the coming year Miss Sangster's department will be one of the foremost in varied human interest. She has many projects in view which will surprise and delight readers of the Christian Herald. A few of these topics we are privileged to mention:

"From One Woman to Another" will be continued,
"Stories of Girls Who have Made Good in Business and the Home,"
"Women and the War,"
"The Slums of the City," and many short stories.

445 Additional Difficult Bible Questions Answered
The Christian Herald Bible House New York

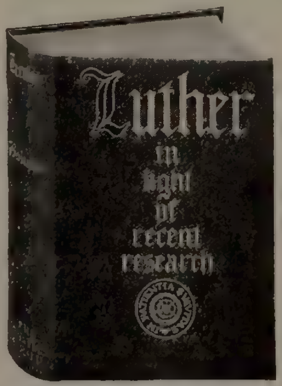
WHEN the earlier volume entitled "555 Difficult Bible Questions Answered" was published, it met with such an enthusiastic reception that we have been encouraged to follow it with a second volume. Like its predecessor, it forms a compact repository of information, invaluable to pastors, scholars, students, laymen and the general reader. It illuminates and explains a large number of obscure passages, many of which might be misunderstood by the average reader.

Presenting the work of the ablest and soundest expositors in all the denominations, the new book will be found a help to many inquiring souls over the "hard places" in the Bible, and a comfort and encouragement to all who are earnestly striving to learn the truth as presented in the Word.

We will send a copy of "445 Additional Difficult Bible Questions Answered," postpaid, together with the Christian Herald for one year, for $2.35.
Or, we will send a copy to present subscribers as a reward for sending us one new yearly subscription to the Christian Herald with $2.00.

MARTIN LUTHER ANNIVERSARY BOOK

"Luther in Light of Recent Research"



WHILE there are several lives of Luther, Professor Heinrich Boehmer's famous work, which has attracted universal attention in Europe, is one of the best that has ever appeared.

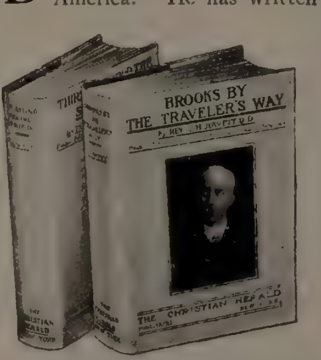
The Christian Herald has had the work translated by Professor Carl F. Huth, Jr., of the University of Chicago, who has succeeded in preserving the spirit and the expression of the original in a remarkable degree.

This great book, which should be read by every Protestant in America, is supplemented by a series of eighty-one Luther pictures, all of them from the most authentic sources, and the whole forming a Luther Picture Gallery.

We will send a copy of "Luther in Light of Recent Research," illustrated, postpaid, together with the Christian Herald for one year, for $2.50; unillustrated for $2.25.
Or, we will send a copy to present subscribers as a reward for sending us one new yearly subscription to the Christian Herald with $2.00.

TWO BOOKS BY A FAMOUS PASTOR

Rev. J. H. Jowett, D.D.



DOCTOR JOWETT has been aptly described as "the most spiritual preacher in America." He has written these two volumes, "Thirsting for the Springs" and "Brooks by the Traveler's Way," in his happiest vein, and the gift of felicitous expression shines out on every page.

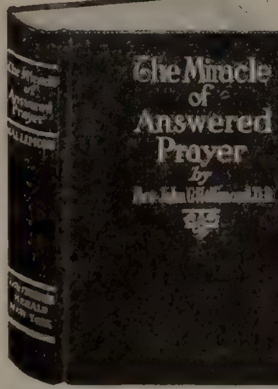
The reader is carried along through gardens and woodlands, as on a pleasant journey. He is in a rarefied atmosphere and is buoyed and uplifted unconsciously at every step. The varied experiences of life, its trials, allurements, disappointments and surprises, pass before him like a moving picture.

These two volumes, aggregating 530 pages, handsomely bound in cloth, will be sent together with the Christian Herald for one year, postpaid, for $2.50.
Or, we will send a copy of each volume to present subscribers as a reward for sending us one new yearly subscription to the Christian Herald with $2.00.

THE MIRACLE OF ANSWERED PRAYER

By REV. JOHN G. HALLIMOND, D. D.

A Book With a Message for Every Soul

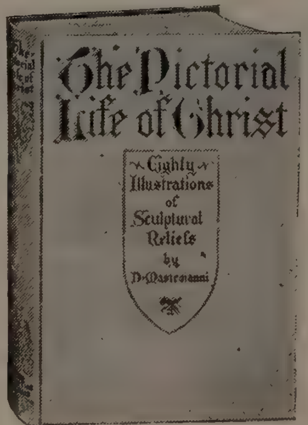


THINK of hundreds of authenticated answers to prayer, multiplied in the course of a year to thousands. This is the story told in "The Miracle of Answered Prayer." It is a recital of tremendous and conclusive importance to the Christian world and one which cannot be controverted. It is a book that no one can read without becoming convinced of its truth and of the wonderful goodness of our Heavenly Father toward all who seek Him in the spirit of faith and contrition.

This book contains authenticated instances, not ancient, but happening in our own time—now—of answered prayers, all of which are presented in the name of Jesus, and submitted to the Divine Will. There is hardly a conceivable situation in human experience which is not included in this wonderful book.

We will send a copy of "The Miracle of Answered Prayer," postpaid, together with the Christian Herald for one year, for $2.35.
Or, we will send a copy to present subscribers as a reward for sending us one new yearly subscription to the Christian Herald with $2.00.

THE PICTORIAL LIFE OF CHRIST



The Pictorial Life of Christ
Eighty Illustrations of Sculptural Reliefs by D. Mastroianni

EIGHTY magnificent sculptural illustrations by the famous Italian master-sculptor, Domenico Mastroianni, who has "imbibed the very spirit of the Holy Land." In his scenes, every figure stands out with vivid distinctness and almost startling clearness of detail. The characters, postures, and surroundings are those of Nazareth and Jerusalem. We see the Saviour himself—a commanding figure of royal dignity blended with divine pity, yet withal intensely human—"in all things as we are."

In simple, attractive language, the story of the life of Jesus is told by the Rev. Ira S. Dodd, who has adhered faithfully to the narrative in the Gospels.

We will send a copy of "The Pictorial Life of Christ," postpaid, together with the Christian Herald for one year, for $2.25.

Or, we will send a copy to present subscribers as a reward for sending us one new yearly subscription to the Christian Herald with $2.00.

Adventures in Neighboring

VERA L. CONNOLLY

MISS CONNOLLY is a writer who, after living in the country for years, is now exiled to the city by the demands of her work. Her heart is still in the country, however, as are many of the friends and associations she holds most dear.

It is just because she knows and loves country life, its joys and trials, its problems, and the way in which plucky rural women have solved them for the good of the community, that she believes a frank exchange of experiences between such rural women—those who have helped to make their village or farm community a better and happier place to live in—to be worth while for us all. The editors of the Christian Herald agree with her; and so a new department for this purpose, conducted by Miss Connolly, under the homey title of

Adventures in Neighboring appears regularly in the Christian Herald

To this department, every rural subscriber of the Christian Herald is invited to contribute her own most inspiring "Adventures in Neighboring." The most helpful of these letters will be paid for and published. And it is the hope of Miss Connolly that every thrilling and profitable adventure on which any rural community (led by its women) has embarked, from the giving of a community pageant to the planting of trees on a village street, will be described here for the encouragement and inspiration of country women everywhere.

Other Splendid Features

THE CHRISTIAN HERALD is doing something more than merely placing interesting reading matter in the homes of its readers. It is giving them a part in a great enterprise; it is giving them spiritual and material helpfulness. It is the one magazine that represents, in the most vital way, all of the interests of Protestant Christianity and of the onmarching Church of Christ. Week after week the Christian Herald is giving its readers issues of absorbing interest.

Weekly sermons, each week by a distinguished pastor.

Meditations, one for each day in the week. Dr. J. H. Jowett contributes the one for Sunday reading. The others are contributed by well-known pastors.

International Sunday School Lesson by Dr. Allison.

Young People's Societies: Epworth League, Christian Endeavor, Baptist Young People's Union; outlined by experts.

Weekly double-page of illustrations.

Review of the news of the week the world over.

The Bible and Newspaper, by Dr. Ferdinand C. Iglehart.

Splendid editorials on questions of the day.

Spiritual work in the Camps.

Bible lands in the war: what has happened in these lands will be told in the Christian Herald.

The Church and the war: a great and vital question for all Christians.

You should be a regular reader of the Christian Herald and enjoy these special features which are now appearing.

ISAIAH 61 The Mission of the Lord's Anointed One

22 A [b] little one shall become a thousand, and a small one a strong nation: I the LORD will hasten it in his time.

CHAPTER 61

The Redeemer Comes to Zion with Blessings.

THE [a] Spirit of the Lord GOD is upon me; because the LORD hath anointed me to preach good tidings unto the meek; he hath sent me [b] to bind up the brokenhearted, to proclaim [c] liberty to the captives, and the opening of the prison to them that are bound; ★
2 To [d] proclaim the acceptable year of the LORD, and [e] the day of vengeance of our God; to [f] comfort all that mourn; ★
3 To appoint unto them that mourn in Zion, [g] to give unto them beauty for ashes, the oil of joy for mourning, the garment of praise for the spirit of heaviness; that they might be called trees of righteousness, the [h] planting of the LORD, [i] that he might be glorified. ★
4 ¶ And they shall [j] build the old wastes, they shall raise up the former desolations, and they shall repair the waste cities, the desolations of many generations.
5 And [k] strangers shall stand and feed your flocks, and the sons of the alien shall be your plowmen and your vinedressers.
6 But [l] ye shall be named the Priests of the LORD: men shall call you the Ministers of our God: ye shall eat the riches of the Gentiles, and in their glory shall ye boast yourselves.
7 For [m] your shame ye shall have double; and for confusion they shall rejoice in their portion: therefore in their land they shall possess the double: everlasting joy shall be unto them.
8 For I the LORD love judgment, I hate robbery for burnt offering; and I will direct their work in truth, [n] and I will make an everlasting covenant with them.
9 And their seed shall be known among the Gentiles, and their offspring among the people: all that see them shall acknowledge them, that they are the seed which the LORD hath blessed.
10 I will greatly rejoice in the LORD, my soul shall be joyful in my God; for he hath clothed me with the garments of salvation, he hath covered me with the robe of righteousness, as [o] a bridegroom decketh [1] himself with ornaments, and as a bride adorneth herself with her jewels.
11 For as the earth bringeth forth her bud, and as the garden causeth the things that are sown in it to spring forth; so the Lord GOD will cause [p] righteousness [q] and praise to spring forth before all the nations.

CHAPTER 62

The Redeemer Calls the Watchmen to Awake.

FOR Zion's sake will I not hold my peace, and for Jerusalem's sake I will not rest, until the righteousness thereof go forth as brightness, and the salvation thereof as a lamp that burneth.
2 And the Gentiles shall see thy righteousness, and all kings thy glory: [a] and thou shalt be called by a new name, which the mouth of the LORD shall name.
3 Thou shalt also be a [b] crown of glory in the hand of the LORD, and a royal diadem in the hand of thy God.
4 Thou [c] shalt no more be termed Forsaken; neither shall thy land any more be termed [1] Desolate: but thou shalt be called [2] Hephzibah, and thy land [3] Beulah: for the LORD delighteth in thee, and thy land shall be married.
5 For as a young man marrieth a virgin, so shall thy sons marry thee: and [4] as the bridegroom rejoiceth over the bride, so shall thy God rejoice over thee.
6 ¶ I [d] have set watchmen upon thy walls, O Jerusalem, which shall never hold their peace day nor night: [5] ye that make mention of the LORD, keep not silence,
7 And give him no [6] rest, till he establish, and till he make Jerusalem [e] a praise in the earth.
8 The LORD hath sworn by his right hand, and by the arm of his strength, [7] Surely I will no more give [f] thy corn to be meat for thine enemies; and the sons of the stranger shall not drink thy wine, for the which thou hast labored:
9 But they that have gathered it shall eat it, and praise the LORD; and they that have brought it to-

Jesus Baptized; he Undergoes Temptation ST. MATTHEW 4

and his meat was locusts and wild [i] honey.
5 ¶ Then went out to him Jerusalem, and all Judea, and all the region round about Jordan,
6 And [j] were baptized of him in Jordan, confessing their sins.
7 But when he saw many of the Pharisees and Sadducees come to his baptism, he said unto them, O generation of vipers, who hath warned you to flee from [k] the wrath to come?
8 Bring forth therefore fruits meet for [1] repentance:
9 And think not to say within yourselves, [l] We have Abraham to our father: for I say unto you, that God is able of these stones to raise up children unto Abraham.
10 And now also the axe is laid unto the root of the trees: [m] therefore every tree which bringeth not forth good fruit is hewn down, and cast into the fire.
11 I [n] indeed baptize you with water unto repentance: but he that cometh after me is mightier than I, whose shoes I am not worthy to bear: [o] he shall baptize you with the Holy Ghost, and with fire:
12 Whose fan is in his hand, and he will thoroughly [p] purge his floor, and gather his wheat into the garner; but he will [q] burn up the chaff with unquenchable fire.
13 ¶ Then cometh Jesus [r] from Galilee to Jordan unto John, to be baptized of him.
14 But John forbade him, saying, I have need to be baptized of thee, and comest thou to me?
15 And Jesus answering said unto him, Suffer it to be so now: for thus it becometh us to [s] fulfil all righteousness. Then he suffered him.
16 And [t] Jesus, when he was baptized, went up straightway out of the water: and, lo, the heavens were opened unto him, and he saw the [u] Spirit of God descending like a dove, and lighting upon him:
17 And [v] lo a voice from heaven, saying, [w] This is my beloved Son, in whom I am well pleased.

CHAPTER 4

The Temptation of Jesus; his first Disciples.

THEN was [a] Jesus led up of [b] the spirit into the wilderness [c] to be tempted of the devil.
2 And when he had [d] fasted forty days and forty nights, he was afterward a hungered.
3 And when the tempter came to him, he said, If thou be the Son of God, command that these stones be made bread.
4 But he answered and said, It is written, [f] Man shall not live by bread alone, but by every word that proceedeth out of the mouth of God.
5 Then the devil taketh him up into the [g] holy city, and setteth him on a pinnacle of the temple,
6 And saith unto him, If thou be the Son of God, cast thyself down: for it is written, [h] He shall give his angels charge concerning thee: and in their hands they shall bear thee up, lest at any time thou dash thy foot against a stone.
7 Jesus said unto him, It is written again, [i] Thou shalt not tempt the Lord thy God.
8 Again, the devil taketh him up into an exceeding high mountain, and sheweth him all the kingdoms of the world, and the glory of them;
9 And saith unto him, All these things will I give thee, if thou wilt fall down and worship me.
10 Then saith Jesus unto him, Get thee hence, Satan: for it is written, Thou [j] shalt worship the Lord thy God, and him only shalt thou serve.
11 Then the devil [k] leaveth him, and, behold, [l] angels came and ministered unto him.
12 ¶ Now [m] when Jesus had heard that John was [1] cast into prison, he departed into Galilee;
13 And leaving Nazareth, he came and dwelt in Capernaum, which is upon the sea coast, in the borders of Zabulon and Nephthalim:
14 That it might be fulfilled which was spoken by Esaias the prophet, saying,
15 The [n] land of Zabulon, and the land of Nephthalim, by the way of the sea, beyond Jordan, Galilee of the Gentiles;
16 The [o] people which sat in darkness saw great light; and to them which sat in the region and shadow of death light is sprung up.
17 From [p] that time Jesus began to preach, and to say, [q] Repent: for the kingdom of heaven is at hand.

CHRISTIAN HERALD RED LETTER BIBLES AND TESTAMENTS

Our Red Letter Bible—Only Genuine Edition

The only genuine edition of the Red Letter Bible is the Authorized or King James' Version, unchanged save for the variation of the color in the type. Two colors (Red and Black) are employed, in accordance with the simple plan devised by the late Dr. Louis Klopsch, the Originator of the Red Letter principle applied to the Holy Scriptures.

What Is a Red Letter Bible?

1. In the Old Testament the passages quoted by our Lord, or directly related to incidents to which he referred, are Printed in Red.

2. In the New Testament, the words universally accepted as those of the Saviour are Printed in Red.

3. A Red Star (★) immediately following a verse in the Old Testament indicates that the verse embodies a prophetic reference to Christ as the coming Messiah.

The Christian Herald Red Letter Bible, illustrated above, Contains Full References; also a Concordance, Subject Index, and Dictionary—all under One Alphabetical Arrangement—together with Helps, Maps, and Numerous Illustrations.

The text is set in Bold-Face Minion, especially designed for this work. There are 268 pages of Helps or Concordance and 17 superb Maps. This gem of a Bible, small in bulk, light in weight, very legible and very durable, weighs only 20 ounces. It is bound in American Levant, overlapping edges, red-under-gold, and makes altogether the handiest and most satisfactory Bible now on the market. In above illustration size of type and size of page are reduced. We send this superb Bible, together with The Christian Herald for one whole year, for . . $$4^{50}$

Or, we will send it to old subscribers as a reward for sending us two NEW yearly subscriptions to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD with $2.00 for each.

Genuine Morocco, Calf Lined

If you can afford to pay $1 more, ask for the same Bible bound in Genuine Morocco, Calf Finish, Leather Lining, Silk Sewed, which will wear a Lifetime. This Bible is Equal to Any $10.00 Bible. It is Sent with THE CHRISTIAN HERALD for one Year, FOR ONLY . . . . $$5^{50}$

Our Thanksgiving Bird

OUR one day of universal feasting, a day set apart by Presidential proclamation for rendering thanks to the Creator for the blessings of a bounteous harvest and for the prosperity of the people, is "Thanksgiving Day." The first time that Thanksgiving Day and the turkey were brought into intimate relation was when Governor Bradford of Plymouth Colony, in 1621, set aside a day of thanksgiving to celebrate the gathering of the first harvest made by the Pilgrims who had come over in the Mayflower.

In those days the wild turkey still abounded in the forests of New England. From that day to this the turkey, either wild or tame, has occupied the place of honor on the Thanksgiving dinner-table.

The demand for Thanksgiving and Christmas turkey is enormous, and to fill this demand carloads of turkeys begin reaching the city markets shortly after the middle of November, and continue well through the month of December. The greater number of turkeys are raised on grain and stock farms in the West, it being possible to raise a large flock at a small cost and with little attention, as the birds pass over the grain fields and consume shucked grain and insects dangerous to the crop. About one-tenth of the total supply of turkeys comes from Texas, and almost as many from Missouri, Indiana, Illinois, Kentucky, and Ohio. In Texas, where there is an abundance of range suitable for turkeys, flocks of several hundred are not uncommon. Throughout the Middle West, where farms are smaller, the flocks average between fifty and seventy-five fowls per farm.

Turkeys on a California ranch, busily fattening themselves for the annual feast which Mr. Hoover says must be shy of cranberry sauce this year

The flock is permitted to run as it pleases during the summer and early fall, but as November approaches, they are penned and the fattening begins. A few turkey raisers, particularly in the Middle Atlantic and New England states, dress their turkeys at home and sell direct to the consumer or city markets. In some sections where turkeys are very generally raised there is held twice each year, once previous to Thanksgiving and again shortly before Christmas, what is known as "Turkey Day." On these days all those who have turkeys to sell dress them and bring them to town, where they are bid on by shippers or by turkey buyers for various city produce houses, and sold to the highest bidder. Turkey-picking bees are often held, like the old-fashioned corn-husking bees.

The "turkey drive" is a common sight in Texas and Missouri in the fall. Buyers go back into the country for miles and purchase direct of the rancher his turkey flock, weighing and paying for the fowls as accepted. Sometimes a flock will be driven in this fashion from fifteen or thirty miles back on the plains, the flock numbering as high as one thousand turkeys. In one case eight thousand turkeys were gathered together at a point in Texas, and driven by thirty men a distance of thirteen miles in two days.

As turkeys shrink heavily when shipped to market alive for any great distance, it has become customary to dress and pack them in boxes or barrels of ice at the killing-point, shipping them in car lots under refrigeration to the distributing points. One of the longest shipments of live turkeys is from Tennessee to New York. Twice each year, for Thanksgiving and Christmas, a train known as the "turkey special" is made up at Morristown, Tenn., and rushed to the metropolis. On the day of shipment cars of live turkeys arrive at Morristown from surrounding points, and these are made up into one train, each car containing about 1,200 turkeys. One man is sent with each car, whose duty it is to feed and water the birds and see that they are weighed correctly when unloaded. Turkeys eat very little during shipment.

On arriving at Jersey City the birds are placed in coops holding about fifteen each, to be delivered to the various New York markets.

Making Steel for the War

the coal to coke, and that was the result.

TODAY they make coke in about one-fifth of that time, and they get 80 per cent. of the coal contents of the coke, while the remaining 20 per cent. is nearly all saved in the way of by-products. This 20 per cent. comes out in gas, which, in the Gary plant, amounts to about one hundred million cubic feet every twenty-four hours. This is run through a by-product plant which takes out of the gas vast quantities of ammonia liquor and the ammonia sulphate which is now being used to increase our food supply. From this same gas also comes benzol, which has many of the properties of gasoline, and is used largely in the industrial arts. It furnishes also a certain percentage of toluol, a powerful explosive which is now used on the battlefields of Europe, and also tar and naphthalene. Indeed, of all that goes into the coke plant today practically nothing is lost.

As it is now, they have here at Gary 560 of these great by-product ovens, and they expect to increase this number to 700, so many that it will require 12,500 tons of coal per day to operate them. In the past the coal went into the beehive oven in a lump. It is now crushed to a powder or flour, so fine that the grains will pass through a mesh of ninety holes to the inch. After crushing it is carried into the furnaces by conveyors and it drops automatically into the oven. When the oven is full it is so sealed that it is impossible for the air to get in or the gas to get out. It is then in a huge steel box, about which a blazing heat of 1,200 degrees Fahrenheit plays. It takes this heat to release the gases of which the by-products are made, and to transform the coal to coke of just the right quality for the making of steel.

And now let me tell you something about the soldiers of this great branch of our industrial army. As I have said, there are more than a million iron and steel makers now in the ranks and they are among the most efficient of our troops here at home. There are more than 250,000 men in the employ of the United States Steel Corporation alone.

I have written of the efficiency of our iron mines and how by steam shovels we are getting out ore for the steel required for the war. A single steam shovel will mine from five to seven thousand tons in one day, or enough to load a train of two-horse wagons thirty or forty miles long.

Five up-to-date railroads are taking the iron from the mines down to the lakes. Efficiency is stamped upon the cars and their operation. Each car holds upward of 100,000 pounds, and from fifty to one hundred of them are carried down to the ports by a single engine. These trains are loaded in the mines and they do not stop until their contents are dropped into the great ore bins through which, by gravity, they pass into the mighty steamers that carry them a thousand miles down the lakes.

THE loading docks about Lake Superior have cost millions. You may see them at Two Harbors, at Duluth, and at the ports of northern Wisconsin and Michigan. I came into Two Harbors on the James A. Farrell, the flagship of the fleet of the United States Steel Corporation, and watched them taking on ore. The huge steamer, a low, rakish looking craft about sixty feet wide and 600 feet long, came to anchor under a steel pier as high as an eight-story house. The pier reached like a great arm far out into the water. There are four of these piers at Two Harbors and one of them is almost half a mile long. Each pier upholds a double row of bins made of concrete into which the ore is dropped from the cars which shoot in from the mines to the tracks overhead. The Farrell has thirty-four hatches, and, were it advisable, all could be loading at once from that many bins overhead. It takes only two or three minutes to empty a bin, and 12,000 tons of ore have been loaded in less than an hour.

Similar loading is going on at the other ports of the lake. During my stay at Ashland, Wis., where I went to take passage on a steamer carrying ore from the Gogebic mines down to the Illinois steel plant, I observed how the ore was mixed and graded during the loading. To make the best steel one must have just the right proportion of certain ores, and the mixing is done in the loading so that when the ore reaches the steel plant it is ready to be dumped without change into the furnaces. Everything is scientifically exact. Indeed, everything connected with the steel for the war is based upon scientific investigation and cost efficiency methods. The use of machinery to take the place of human muscle was never carried nearer perfection.

The coal docks of Duluth cover acres. The coal is both anthracite and bituminous. It supplies the iron mines, and it is shipped from here over the railroads to all parts of the great Northwest. The amount taken up the lakes often exceeds twenty-five or thirty million tons a year, the greater part of which comes to the ports of Lake Superior.

DULUTH is the chief port on the lake. It is the head of lake navigation and the industrial center of this mining region. It is rapidly growing and it promises to steadily increase in the future. One of the possible sources of growth is in the transfer of certain kinds of steel-making from the lower ports to this point, and especially so far as the demands of the Northwest are concerned. As it is now, the steel used in Duluth is made a thousand miles away from the mines and the market. The furnaces are nearer the coal regions, and the iron is taken to the coal. They are now experimenting in bringing the coal to the ore, and the United States Steel Corporation has built a great plant within a few miles of Duluth, where the ore can be taken down almost by gravity and where the coal can be brought in ships up the lakes. This plant is that of the Minnesota Steel Company, situated on the St. Louis River, which has two miles of water front where the steamers can land. The corporation owns fifteen hundred acres, and upon this it has constructed blast furnaces, open-hearth furnaces and many by-product coke ovens.

Duluth has now more than 100,000 population. When I visited it a generation ago I saw real estate signs far out in the water, offering the space about as valuable lots; but today that water is covered with wharves and docks and the city's wharfage arrangements are among the wonders of the industrial world.

The Witness

By GRACE LIVINGSTON HILL LUTZ

Author of "The Voice in the Wilderness"

CHAPTER XXV

GILA took herself off to a house-party the very next day, with only a tinted, perfumed note, like a flutter of painted wings, to explain that the butterfly had melted into the pleasant sunshine to taste honey in other flowers for a time.

In a way her going was a relief to Courtland. He didn't understand himself. There was something wrong, and he wanted to find out what before he saw her again.

It was while he was in this troubled state that he stumbled upon the Bible as something that might possibly bring light.

He had studied it before in his Biblical Literature classes, and found it much like other books, a literary classic, a wonderful gem of beauty in its way, a rare collection of legends, proverbs, allegories, and the like. But looking at it now, with the possible hypothesis that it was the Word of God, all was changed.

He remembered once seeing a tray of gems in an exhibit, and among them one that looked like a common pebble. The man who had charge of the exhibit took the little pebble and held it in the palm of his hand for a moment, when it suddenly began to glow and sparkle with all the colors of the rainbow and rival all the other gems. The man explained that only the warmth of the human hand could cause this marvelous change. You might lay the stone under the direct rays of a summer sun, yet it would have no effect until you took it in your hand, when it would give forth its beauty once more.

It was like this when he began to read the Bible with the idea that it was the Word of God. Things flashed out at him that fairly dazzled his thoughts; living, palpitating things, as if they were hidden of a purpose to be discovered only by him who cared to search. Hidden truths came to light that filled his soul with wonder. Gradually he understood that belief was the touchstone by which all these treasures were to be revealed. Everywhere he found it, that belief in Christ was a condition to all the blessings promised. He read of hearts hardened and eyes blinded because of unbelief, and came to see that unbelief was something a man was responsible for, not a condition which settled down upon him, and he could not help. Belief was a deliberate act of the will. It was not a theory, nor an intellectual affirmation; it was a position taken, which necessarily must pass into action of some kind. He began to see that without this deliberate belief it was impossible for man to know the things which are purely spiritual. It was the condition necessary for revelation. He was fascinated with the pursuit of his new study.

WITTEMORE came to his room one evening, his face grayer, more strained and horse-like than ever. Wittemore's mother had made another partial recovery and insisted on his return to college. He was plodding patiently, breathlessly along in his classes, trying to catch up again. He had paid Courtland back part of the money he borrowed, and was gradually paying the rest in small instalments. Courtland hated to take it, but saw that it would hurt him to refuse it; so he had fallen into a habit of stopping now and then to talk about his settlement work, just to show a little friendly interest in him. Wittemore had responded with a quiet wistfulness and a patient hovering in the background that touched the other man's heart deeply.

"I've just come from my rounds," said Wittemore, sitting down apologetically on the edge of a chair. "That old lady you carried the medicine to she's been telling me how you made tea and toast!" He paused and looked embarrassed.

"Yes," smiled Courtland. "How's she getting on? Any better?"

"No," said Wittemore, the hopeless gray look settling about his sensitive mouth. "She'll never be any better. She's dying!"

"Well," said Courtland, "that'll be a pleasant change for her, I guess."

Wittemore winced. Death had no pleasant associations for him. "She told me you prayed for her! She wants you to do it again!"

It was plain he thought the praying had been a sort of joke with Courtland.

COURTLAND looked up, the color rising slowly in his face. He saw the accusation in Wittemore's sad eyes.

"Of course I know what you think of such things. I've heard you in the class. I don't believe in them any more myself, either, now." Wittemore's voice had a trail of hopelessness in it. "But somehow I couldn't quite bring myself to make a mockery of prayer, even to please that old woman. You see, my mother still believes in prayer." He spoke apologetically, as of a dear one who had lacked advantages.

"But I do believe in prayer!" said Courtland, earnestly. "What you heard me say in class was before I understood."

"Before you understood?" Wittemore looked puzzled.

"Listen, Wittemore. Things are different now. I've met Jesus Christ and I've got my eyes open. I was blind before, but since I've felt the Presence everything has been different."

And then he told the story of his experience. He did not make a long story of it. He gave brief facts, and when it was finished Wittemore dropped his face into his hands and groaned.

"I'd give anything if I could believe all that again," came from between his long bony fingers. "It's breaking my mother's heart to have me leave the faith!"

The sleek, hay-like hair fell in wisps over his hands, his high, bony shoulders were hunched despairingly over Courtland's study table. He was a great, pitiful object.

"Why don't you, then?" said Courtland, getting up and going to the closet for his overcoat. "It's up to you, you know. You can! God can't do it for you, and of course there's nothing doing till you've taken that step. I found that out!"

"But how do you reconcile things, calamities, disasters, war, suffering, that poor old woman lying on her attic bed alone? How do you reconcile that with the goodness of God?"

"I don't reconcile it. It isn't my business. I leave that to God. If I understood all the whys and wherefores of how this universe is run I'd be great enough to be a God myself."

"But if God is omniscient I can't see how he can let some things go on! He must be limited in power or he'd never let some things happen if he's a good God!" Wittemore's voice had a plaintive sound.

"Well, how do you know that? In the first place, how can you be sure what is a calamity? And say, did it ever strike you that some of the things we blame on God are really up to us? He's handed over his power for us to do things, and we haven't seen it that way; so the things go undone and God is charged with the consequences."

"I wish I could believe that!" said Wittemore.

"You can! When you really want to enough, you will! Come on, let's get that prayer down to the old lady! I'm sort of an amateur yet, but I'll do my best."

Concrete Roadway Intersection at Fort Sheridan, Illinois. Built for Permanence by the United States Government.

Merging Country Roads Into Nation Wide System

LITTLE stretches of improved road here and there in your county won't get you far. To be of greatest benefit, your road improvements should be planned to make road systems.

When roads everywhere are built of concrete, you can get anywhere any time, regardless of season or weather.

Pulling ON a concrete road with a heavy load is easier than pulling AGAINST an earth road with a light load—and it pays better.

Many communities are now awake to this truth. They are building complete systems of concrete roads—roads that outlive the bond issue which made them possible. These concrete road systems are built on carefully selected routes to connect the towns and serve the rural districts. If more of such systems existed today there would be less congestion on our railroads.

Concrete Roads Are Not a Luxury

Practically all of the materials necessary for concrete road building are on the job or near it. First cost is reasonable, maintenance is negligible. They soon earn enough in the savings they produce through low upkeep cost, less wear and tear on vehicles, time saved between objective points, and larger loads, to pay their cost. They are good, profit-earning roads for years after paid for.

Concrete roads prevent many kinds of waste — waste of road funds — waste of perishable products. They permit quick distribution to market centers. And with greater agricultural production we must have more dependable highways for motor transportation to make up in part for the inability of railroads to meet the demands which speeded up industry for war needs are placing upon them.

It takes much less power to get over this concrete than it does on any other type—and power costs money, whether you feed a team or buy gasoline.

CONCRETE ROADS
Their Advantages

No Mud—No Dust
No Ruts—No Holes
No Slipping
No Skidding
Easy Hauling
Smooth Riding
Long Life—Safety
Always ready for use
Low Maintenance
Moderate Cost

Be sure you know what a concrete road is. Concrete is made of portland cement, sand and pebbles or crushed stone, and water. It is hard and durable, rigid and unyielding. Concrete is the material used in building concrete dams, factories, bridges, and big engineering works like the Panama Canal requiring great solidity and strength.

For Ladies and Gentlemen

THEY went out into the mist and murk of a spring thaw. Wittemore never forgot that night's experience—the prayer, and the walk home again through the fog. The old woman died at dawning.

Courtland spent much time thinking about Gila these days. His whole soul was wrapped up in the desire that she might understand. He was longing for her, idealizing her, thinking of her in her innocent beauty, her charming ways; wondering how she would meet him the next time, what he should say to her; living upon her brief, alluring notes that came to him from time to time like fitful rose petals blown from a garden where he longed to be; but yet in a way it was a relief to have her gone until he could settle the great perplexity that was in his mind concerning her.

Gila prolonged her absence by a trip South with her father, and so it was several weeks before Courtland saw her again.

The hour before he went to her he spent in Stephen's room, turning over the leaves of Stephen's Bible. When he rose at last to go he turned again to this verse, which had caught his eye among the marked verses that were always so interesting to him because they seemed to have been landmarks in Stephen's life:

> My presence shall go with thee, and I will give thee rest.

It almost startled him, so well did it seem to suit his need. He read on a few verses:

> And he said unto him, If thy presence go not with me, carry us not up hence. For wherein shall it be known that I and my people have found grace in thy sight? Is it not in that thou goest with us? So shall we be separated, I and my people, from all the people that are upon the face of the earth.

Wonderful words those, implying a close relationship that shut out to a certain extent all others who were not with that Presence. He wished he knew what it all meant! And in that moment was born within him a desire to understand the Bible and know how believing scholars explained everything.

GILA met him with fluttering delight, adoringly pretty in a little frilly pink frock that gave her the look of a pale anemone, wind-blown and sweet and wild.

She talked a good deal about the "dandy times" she had had and the "perfectly peachy" men and girls she had met; flattered him by saying she had seen none handsomer or more distinguished than he was. She accepted as a matter of course the lover-like attitude he adopted, let him tell her of his love as long as he was not too solemn about it, teased and played with him, charmed him with every art she knew, dancing from one mood to another like a sprite, winding her gossamer chains about him more and more, until, when he went from her again, he was fairly intoxicated with her beauty.

He had lulled his anxiety with the thought that he must wait and be patient until Gila saw. But more and more was it growing hard to approach her about the things that were of most moment to him. Sometimes when he was wearily trying to find a way back from the froth of her conversation to the real things he hoped she would enjoy with him some day, she would call him an "old crab," and summon to her side other willing youths to stimulate his jealousy; sometimes youths of unsavory reputation whose presence gave him deep anxiety for her. Then he would tell himself he must be more patient; that she was young and must learn to understand little by little.

Gila developed a great interest in Courtland's future, his plans for a career, of which she chattered to him much and often, suggesting ways in which her father might perhaps help him into a position of prominence and power in the political world. But Courtland, with a shadow of trouble in his eyes, always put her off. He admitted that he had thought of politics, but was not ready yet to say what he would do.

SO spring came on, with its final examinations, and Commencement drawing nearer every day.

Through it all Courtland found much time to be with Gila; often in company, or flashing through a crowded thoroughfare by her side; following her fancy; excusing her follies; laying her mistakes and indiscretions to her youth and innocence; always trying to lead up to his great desire, that she might see his Christ.

Tennelly watched the whole performance anxiously. He wanted Courtland to be drawn out of what he considered his "morbid" state, but not at the price of his peace of mind. He was very sure that Courtland ought not to marry Gila. He was equally sure that she meant nothing serious in her present relation to Courtland. He felt himself responsible in a way because he had agreed in the plot with his uncle to start her on this campaign. But if Courtland should come out of it with a broken heart, what then?

It was just a week before Commencement that the crisis came.

Gila had summoned Courtland to her. She knew that he had that day received another offer from Ramsey Thomas, tempting in the extreme, and baited with alluring possibilities that certainly were dazzling to her if they were not to her lover.

Courtland was tired. He had been through a hard week of examinations, he had been on several committees, and had a number of important class meetings, and the like. He had come to her hoping for a rest and the joy of her society. Just to watch her dainty grace as she moved about a room, handling the tea things and giving him a delicate sandwich or a crisp cake, filled him with joy and soothed his troubled spirit; it was so like his ideal of what a woman should be.

BUT Gila was not handing out tea that afternoon. Very prettily, but quite efficiently, she bored him for information about his plans. Had he no plans whatever about what he was going to do as soon as he had finished college? Of course she knew he had money of his own; but nowadays that was nothing. Even rich men all did something. One wasn't anything unless one was in something big! Hadn't he ever had any offers at all? It was queer, such a brilliant man as he was. She knew lots of young fellows who had no end of chances to get into big things as soon as they were done with their education. Didn't his father know of something, or have something in mind for him? Hadn't he ever been approached.

Goaded at last by her delicate but determined insinuations, Courtland told her. Yes, he had had offers; one in particular that was a fine thing from a worldly point of view, but he didn't intend to take it. It did not fit with his ideal of life. There were things about it that were not square. He wasn't quite sure how his own plans were going to work out yet. Possibly he would study awhile longer somewhere.

Gila frowned. She had no idea of letting him do that. She wanted him to get into something big right away, so that she might begin her career. Study! How stupid! No, indeed! She wanted for a husband no scholar who would bore her with horrid old dull books and lectures and never want to go anywhere with her! She must switch him away from this idea at once! She returned to the rejected business proposition with zeal and avidity. What was it? What did it involve? What were its future possibilities? Great! What on earth could he find in that to object to? How ridiculous! How long ago had that been offered to him? Was it too late to accept? What? He had had the offer repeated even more flatteringly that very day?

"How perfectly wonderful! All that responsibility and all those chances to get to the top! Even a hint of Washington!"

SHE dimpled and opened her great eyes imploringly at him. She pictured herself in glowing terms going with him and holding court among the great of the land! She wheedled and coaxed and all but commanded, while he sat and watched her sadly, realizing how well fitted she was for the things she was describing and how she loved them all.

> So shall we be separated, I and my people, from all the people that are upon the face of the earth!

He started upright! It was as if a Voice had spoken the words, those strange words from the Bible! Was this then what they meant? Separation! But Gila was "his people" now. Was she not one day to be his wife? He must explain it all to her. He must let her know that he had chosen a way of separation that forbade the paths wherein she was longing to wander. Would she shrink and wish to turn back? Nevertheless, he must make it plain to her.

Gently, quietly, he tried to make her understand. He told her of the factory that was built to blind the eyes of those who were trying to uplift and help men. He tried to make conditions plain where girls as young as she, and with just such hopes and fears and ambitions, perhaps in some cases just as much sweetness and native beauty as she had, were obliged to spend long hours of toil amid surroundings that must crush the life out of any pure soul, and turn all the sweetness to bitterness, the beauty to a peril! He hinted at things she did not know or dream of; dreadful things from which her life had always been safely guarded; and how he could not, for the sake of those crushed souls, accept a position that would close his mouth and tie his hands forever from doing anything about it. He told her he could not accept honor that was founded upon dishonor; that he had taken Christ for his pattern and guide; that he could do nothing that would drive God's presence from him.

She had been sitting with her face averted, but when he reached this point in his argument she sprang to her feet, her head thrown up, her whole lithe body stiff and imperious.

"It is time this stopped!" she said, and her voice was cold li'e a frozen dagger and went straight through his heart. "It is time you put away forever this ridiculous idea of a Presence, and of setting yourself up to be better than any one else! This isn't religion, it is fanaticism! And it has got to stop now and forever, or I will have nothing whatever to do with you. Either you give up this idea of a ghost-following you around all the time and accept Mr. Ramsay Thomas's offer this afternoon, or you and I part! You can choose, now, between me and your Presence!"

Thanksgiving at the Bowery Mission

By DR. JOHN G. HALLIMOND, Superintendent

NEVER has this country known such a Thanksgiving Day as this, the sound of praise mingling with the din of arms and thunder of cannon, to the accompaniment of the cries of widows and orphans and the moans of wounded and dying men.

Notwithstanding the grim and ghastly horrors of the present European conflict, there are certain matters connected with it that should be causes for unrestrained congratulation and joy.

With the tragic and flaming illumination of a world-war as a background, the real significance of Scriptural Thanksgiving stands out in clear and vivid lines.

It is only when Thanksgiving is accompanied by sacrifice that its reality is thoroughly demonstrated.

The whole world today surrounds the sacrificial altar. The dearest idols of human hearts are being offered up. Rich and poor alike, hand in hand, are surrendering their best beloved belongings, "offering unto God thanksgiving, and paying their vows unto the Most High."

Christian Herald readers are always in conspicuous advance at times like these, and not a member of our great family will fail to celebrate Thanksgiving Day in this devoutly sacrificial spirit.

I feel confident that it only needs a word of gentle reminder to men to secure from them their usual Thanksgiving support for the work of the Bowery Mission.

THE Mission is in real and pressing need of funds. This is nothing to be ashamed of. It has never been the policy of the Mission to hoard its money. That money is given every year to be spent in helping the needy, so that at this time of the year the exchequer is always empty. We have the happy consciousness that during the past year not one cent has been expended carelessly, not one cent has gone for useless administrative purposes. Every individual item of expense has been keenly scrutinized, and it has been made to "touch the spot." But we have touched the bottom of the barrel. We are really and sorely in need.

The Mission is actually contributing to the resources of the country and aiding it in the war by giving something even more valuable than money, namely, men.

The Mission is also contributing men whom it has been the means of transforming from helpless dependents into active workers to fill the vacancies caused by younger men having joined the army. This work is being accomplished every day in our Industries, Labor Settlement and Farm, and there cannot be any question as to the real value to the community of this work.

THE Bowery Mission never had a better opportunity than at present for doing real, deep, spiritual work among men. There are as many men in the Bowery today as, perhaps, in any period of its history. They are not here for dissipation or pleasure, but because it has become such a national center or clearing house for labor. Between twenty and thirty large labor agencies have been opened by the railroad companies and large corporations for the purpose of securing men, so that thousands of men pass through the Bowery every day to these positions. We get many of them into our meetings at night, and a very satisfactory proportion of them are led to declare themselves desirous of living a Christian life.

We are still left with a very large number of incapable men to care for; men who are homeless and outcast, in many cases through no fault of their own. Circumstances have been too much for them; sickness, accident, change of occupation, or supercession of hand labor by machines, has thrown them out of work; the poverty tiger has soon had them in its jaws; they have become depressed, shabby-looking, homeless, and, because of these things, have given way to the drink habit, and the whole fabric of their human personality has been shattered. But we preach the Gospel of Hope, and bring many of them out from the depths of despair into the light again.

This work cannot be discontinued. The curse of God would rest upon us if we slackened our efforts at all. But we can only do as much of this work as our means will allow. Our rent, lighting and heating, provisions and all other expenses are inordinately high.

I appeal to the readers of the Christian Herald to come to our assistance. The Bowery Mission is their particularly assigned field of home missionary effort. Every dollar they give is given to the Lord and will receive his blessing.

Contributions should be sent to the Treasurer, Mr. Theodore Waters, Christian Herald, Bible House, New York City.

A GOOD WOMAN'S BAD GLOVES

A GOOD woman recently ripped a pair of gloves and her temper at the same time.

She bought the gloves from her local dealer, after reading in an advertisement what the manufacturer had to say about them.

She ripped the gloves the first time she wore them; then threw them away, quickly saying: "I'll never buy any more gloves of that man."

Gloves, ladies, go through forty or fifty operations before you wear them. The skin must first be sound; the dehairing, curing, dyeing, cutting, shaping, stitching and inspection must all be done by human beings.

"To err is human, to forgive divine."

Only one pair of gloves out of many hundreds or thousands goes wrong, rips or tears.

The glove-dealer would have made good to the lady—had he known.

The glove-manufacturer would have made good to the dealer—had he known.

In this case was it the gloves that failed—or the lady?

The advertisements in the Christian Herald are guaranteed. Our advertisers and this paper will repair any of the human errors that are bound to happen.

Ezra and Nehemiah Teach the Law

International Sunday School Lesson for December 9. Neh. 8

A Community Bible Class

By Rev. George D. Allison, Ph. D.

WE have reviewed the story of the civic reconstruction of Jerusalem under the able leadership of Nehemiah. Now we come to the promulgation of the priestly law, which became the greatest feature of Jewish religion after the Exile. Settled conditions of community life again, a reasonable security behind the city walls, made possible the renewing of the national covenant with Jehovah and the carrying into effect of Ezra's plans. There are many difficult problems for students of history in this period, owing to the scantiness of the records available. One of them concerns the whereabouts of Ezra during the thirteen years when we hear nothing of his activities. But we like to think that it was in this period that he compiled and codified the law.

So we see the priest and the governor side by side, as in the days of Zerubbabel and Joshua.

Democracy in Religion

The dead religions of the ancient world were characterized by secret rites and mysteries. Priests have always made their esoteric knowledge a means of lording it over the flock and using their mystic formulas to keep the laity in ignorant subjection. But such was not the case in Judaism, and when the scribes in Jesus' time became arrogant they travestied the very spirit of the Law itself. For the Hebrew religion was a democratic one. The attempt of Ezra to popularize its teachings was characteristic. The priests were given a sacred function and high privilege, but it was with the knowledge and cooperation of the masses that they were to exercise their office.

Various anniversaries of 400 years of Protestantism are coming before us just now. What was this protest of which we still cherish the fruits? Fundamentally it was a declaration for democracy in religion, for "The Liberty of a Christian Man," as Luther put it in one of his mightiest pamphlets, and against a closed Bible, an ecclesiastical aristocracy, and everything that removes God from the people.

So we have in the 8th of Nehemiah the Protestant idea: the Book of the Law opened to the people of God, the church as a Teaching Institution, the ratification by the common man of the Covenant of the Lord.

Need of Religious Instruction for Adults

How much the Hebrews of the reconstructed city needed Ezra's instruction! Books were few, and men who could read fewer still. Moreover, the distressed remnants in the land had been poor and ignorant in the extreme. When the book was read they wept to think of their violation of its precepts through sheer ignorance for the most part.

We all endorse the principle today that a free democracy must have an educated citizenship. We are now ready to endorse the proposition that a powerful and spiritual Christianity must have a constituency of religiously educated believers. We have made and are making wonderful strides in developing methods and programs for the religious education of children. Graded lessons, teachers' institutes, and consecrated workers are going to result splendidly in the next generation. Meanwhile men and women must keep growing spiritually and intellectually.

It is tragic to find a grown man trying to get along on the ideas he secured as a twelve-year-old boy in Sunday school. Many men are outside of the kingdom because they have outgrown childish conceptions of God and substituted nothing virile and adult.

All the people gathered themselves together as one man. This is the modern Bible school's ideal—"all the church in the school." We are making real progress too. In countless communities large groups of adults are in organized classes. But often the large class is defectively taught. Too often the men come through the importunity of friends and the attractiveness of the social life, and then learn nothing. "When the group grows beyond thirty it ceases to be a class and becomes an audience." The time has come for the Adult Class Movement to focus on teaching.

So Ezra felt from the very start. He wanted the enthusiasm of the great outpouring of the people, but immediately he supplemented it by the organization of a corps of associate teachers, who took smaller groups, gave explanations, answered inquiries of the individual. On the second day he gathered together the heads of family clans for special instruction, which resulted in the reestablishment of the Feast of Booths as a family religious observance. How about a fathers' class in our communities, a mothers' class, and a social service class as well?

"Understandest Thou What Thou Readest?"

Philip's question in the 8th of Acts might be put to many a teacher and countless Bible readers. To be sure, there is some good gained by any sincere reading of the Scriptures, however unintelligent. But the Bible is a great stimulus to the mind, and in the intelligent student the spirit and the mind are one in entering into the deep things of God. Moreover, much misrepresentation of Christianity, much sorry fanaticism, comes of pure ignorance.

So Ezra set a high standard of understanding the Law. The people had the advantage of a trained teacher. He read distinctly. How we wish all who read in class would do that little thing to help! His helpers gave the sense so that they understood the reading. That is what we try to do each Sunday. The hearers were attentive; they knew he had a real message. They were reverent; they stood up for the hallelujah and bowed low for the prayer. Surely we ought to expect and to cultivate this attitude; for the Bible is just as important in its bearing on our life, our problems, the future of our nation that we love, as it was for the Jews who thronged about Ezra the Scribe.

Educational Evangelism

This was a real revival of religion. But notice that it was not mere emotionalism, but was educational. But it was evangelism nevertheless—it led to repentance and reformation. There is much criticism of modern evangelism that is just. Great crowds, clever methods of organization, stirring exhortations will never take the place of "teaching them to observe all things whatsoever I have commanded you." When all is said and done, the greatest evangelist is the Sunday school teacher, and the majority of new members come to the church through teaching the Word.

Fervency comes with understanding. When the Jews understood the things which Ezra taught, they wept. When they understood further, they rejoiced. We do not have to leave emotion out, but to put knowledge and obedience in.

Awakened Consciences

The Bible has the faculty for awakening conscience. Many of these hearers had lost their sense of responsibility, but now their hearts were stirred. The sinner cannot read this book and feel comfortable. The wilful wrongdoer wants to get away from it as far as he can. The conscientious man, though severely rebuked as was Saul of Tarsus, instinctively says, "Lord, what wilt thou have me to do?"

So when Ezra read the law he appealed to the moral sense and to the will for righteousness that characterizes a true child of God. It is undoubtedly true that Protestantism has developed conscience through putting the Bible before men and making it a household book.

The Joy of the Lord

"Rejoice" is a Bible watchword. A man who believes in a holy and wise God should be happy, for life is filled with new meaning and possibility for him. When he learns that this God is a Father, forgiving, loving, healing his children, he should enter into the joy which caused the early Christians to call their religion "glad tidings." Too often has religion been so presented as to make men feel gloomy and afraid. Too often it has divided and distressed households. The love of God should unify men, should make men glad.

We hear frequently nowadays the expression, "Some one is always taking the joy out of life." But it is most often sin that does this. Religion was intended to put joy into life. This ancient Jew gave the cure for care: "The joy of the Lord is your strength."

In his great injunction to rejoice Ezra did not forget the joy of sharing. "Send portions unto him for whom nothing is prepared." Even the joy of God would have been incomplete without this. He delights to give, to share his knowledge, his power and his work with those whom he loves. Let us look forward to making this Christmastide joyous despite all that is dark—by sharing what we have.

How to Get the Lesson Studied; The Christian Herald's Great Plan

THE CHRISTIAN HERALD in its new Bible Picture Study has made this absorbing competition the direct and valuable aid to the Sunday school and the home in a wholly new way.

It has made the basis the Sunday School Uniform Lesson, the Golden Texts and the Daily Bible Home Readings.

The present greatest weakness in the Sunday school system is that the scholars come to the Sunday school unprepared with the lesson. They have neither read the lesson itself in most cases, nor the Daily Home Readings, which throw Bible sidelights upon the lesson. And missing these they have not simply made the teacher's task harder, but they have lost the habit of daily reading of the Bible which the Sunday school should foster as one of its greatest tasks.

And not the scholar only but his parents are not reading the lesson, and are failing therefore to cooperate with the teacher and Sunday school in promoting home interest in lesson preparation.

All the machinery of the Sunday school with its 20,000,000 members in the United States, exists for this one thing, namely, to form character through Bible searching, memorizing and reading. But this machinery breaks down in good part because the scholars do not read the Book.

Gladstone said, "Talk about the questions of the time! There is but one question. How to bring the truths of God's Word into vital contact with all classes of people." And General Grant said, "To the influence of this Book we are indebted for all the progress made in true civilization." And President Wilson said: "No study is more important to the child than the study of the Bible and the truths it teaches."

This is particularly true at this time of reconstruction, when we must have a foundation for our faith and the new program for the nations.

It was just at this point of greatest need that the Christian Herald has come to the rescue of the teacher, pastor, parent, scholar, superintendent of school and Home Department with this unique Bible Picture Study.

Beginning with December, this study will include the searching for texts from the Uniform Lessons, Golden Texts and Daily Bible Home Readings for the following five months, and the fitting of these texts to certain pictures, a set of which the Christian Herald will furnish, together with a little book which will include the full text of the weekly Uniform Lesson, the Daily Home Readings, and the Golden Texts.

The cash rewards which will be awarded to those who select the best verses for the thirty pictures is sure to bring thousands of teachers and scholars to a great study of the lesson material for these months.

This plan will be an incalculable boon in promoting familiarity with these lessons. Some of the best verses for the pictures will be found in the lesson text; some will be found in the Daily Home Readings, and others in the Golden Texts, so that this material will have to be searched through again and again to discover the best verses for the pictures.

Answers need not be sent in until the close of the Bible Picture Study period, of six months, May 31, 1918, being the last day for submitting answers. The complete outfit can be ordered from the Christian Herald up to and including April 22, 1918.

The plan has so many attractive features in promoting a new interest in the Lessons on the part of the fifteen million Sunday school members who are using the Uniform Lesson in this country, that we shall show in this column from time to time the special ways in which it helps. May I here suggest simply the general ways in which it helps.

1. The Sunday School Teacher

It promotes real home study of the Lesson and Bible reading by the scholar and therefore a live lesson with the class. A class following the contest plan will be a class on fire with the lesson.

2. The Superintendent

The school where the plan is followed will be alert in attention to the lesson reading review and appeal for Christian decision

3. The Pastor.

The plan promotes Daily Bible reading and Bible searching in the homes, and furnishes a basis for home family worship

4. The Home Department

New life and interest will be infused into the home reading of the lessons and home readings as required by the Department. New members can be added to the Home Department from homes that may become interested in the study.

5. The Scholar.

Instead of the lesson hour being a bore to the scholar, it is by this plan transformed into a time of keen and enjoyable interest.

Hundreds of Sunday School teachers have written to the Christian Herald asking how the Bible Picture Study can be applied in the Sunday School. The new national Bible Picture Study is the answer. Any questions on any phase of the study will be carefully answered by the Christian Herald.

Young People's Topics for December 9

"Here Am I; Send Me!"

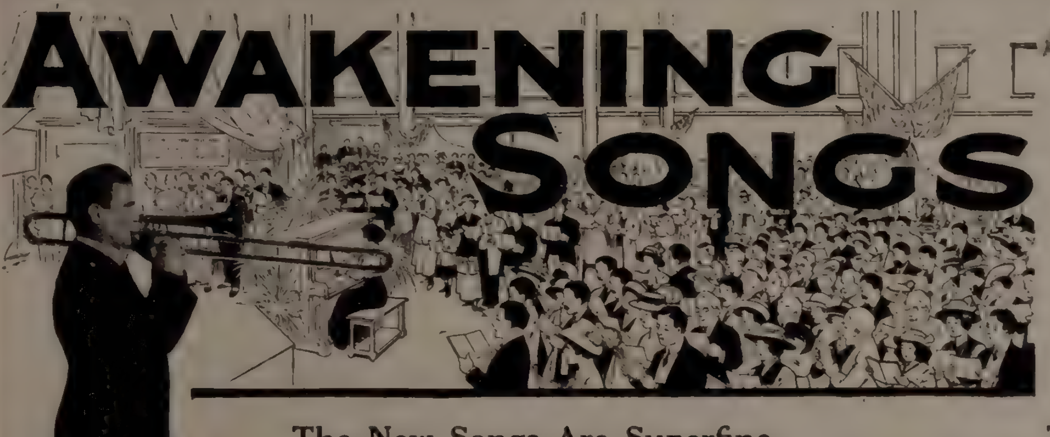
Christian Endeavor and B. Y. P. U. Topics. Isa. 6 : 6-8

EVERY day the Lord is asking, "Whom shall I send?" And every day young women and young men, leaders in the Christian life and colleges of our land, are saying, "Here am I; send me." These he purges and purifies for the special work of carrying the Gospel into those lands where darkness still broods over the faiths of the people. Into each little village and in each city throughout the land, where hearts are heavy and where people are burdened with sorrow or privation, where lives are blackened and hopes blasted by unrepented sin, again the question comes, "Whom shall I send?" and there are those who answer "Here am I; send me." But there are some who seem to answer, "Here am I; send somebody else." For they sing loudly in meeting and quote volubly pleasant passages of God's Word, yet pass by duty on the other side. Perhaps they shiver once or twice when they read that passage where the Saviour says, "Inasmuch as ye did it not." Perhaps after all they have not yet awakened to the wonderful privilege and the unspeakable joy of definite personal work for souls. Let the leader of the meeting first consecrate his own life fully and unreservedly to the needy work to which the Spirit seems to call; then perhaps he can awaken some others and lead them out into a fuller and more complete service. Surely with his own consecration as a beginning he can bring to others a deeper determination to declare to the world the riches of God's love in Christ Jesus.

Epworth Herald Night. One for All, for All Are One

Epworth League Topic. Jer. 31 : 6; Rom. 12 : 4-5

THERE is one officer of each Epworth League chapter whose duty it is to see that the Epworth Herald is taken by the members of the League. The number of Heralds taken is a very good spiritual thermometer of the chapter. The discussion of the Epworth League topic in these columns is meant for the leader of the particular meeting to which it refers, and is of value as an additional help. The Epworth Herald is vibrant with the spirit of consecrated young life. Through it each leaguer is kept informed as to the great purposes of the League, its plans, its hopes, and the duties of its members. It is a weekly school in the applied science of Christian growth, with especial emphasis on the problems and opportunities of young Christians. We recommend the Epworth Herald to every young Methodist who desires to make his life count in the service of the Master.



Will readily take rank as one of the most satisfying and useful gospel songbooks ever offered to the great body of church workers who are more than ever awake to the power and possibilities of the RIGHT KIND OF GOSPEL MUSIC in winning the most glorious victories in evangelization and church upbuilding. RODEHEAVER SONGBOOKS are the winning songbooks of the hour, and this great new book is another great triumph of Rodeheaver songbook making.

The New Songs Are Superfine

They are all 100 per cent. useful and effective. We know they are, for they have been given grilling tests in Billy Sunday campaigns. Many were given this most severe test, and only those that registered unusually high were chosen. In addition to the new songs shown in this small booklet there are many more in the complete book, including many that are very effective as solos, duets and quartets.

The Big Favorites Are Here, Too

"Since Jesus Came Into My Heart," "Brighten the Corner Where You Are," "I Walk With the King," "My Wonderful Dream," "I Want to See Jesus, Don't You?" "Sail On," "In the Garden," and other songs of previous Rodeheaver Books that proved immense favorites are included in Awakening Songs. You cannot get along without them. The departments for the male singers, for primary work, for chorus work, are especially excellent, while great care has been exercised in compiling the old, favorite hymns and the responsive readings.

Comes in three bindings—vellum cloth board, limp cloth and manila. The prices are:

	Cloth	Limp	Manila
Single copies, postpaid	35c	25c	20c
Any quantity, not prepaid, per copy	25c	18c	15c

Orchestration The Success of the orchestrations of our previous books has been remarkable. We are now preparing the scores on Awakening Songs, and the complete volumes will be ready in the near future.

Free Examination

Anyone interested in the improvement of the singing in their church may examine a copy of any of the bindings without charge by merely stating that they will return the book in good condition within 15 days or will remit the retail price. In case a quantity order results from the examination no charge will be made for the sample copy. Ask for our special premium offer on orders amounting to $15.00 or more.

Our Country's Songs

Compiled by Homer A. Rodeheaver Edited by Chas. H. Gabriel

48 pages and handsome cover, old and new patriotic songs, folk songs and gospel songs and hymns appropriate for patrotic gatherings. 10c per copy postpaid; $6.00 per 100, not prepaid. Substantial discount on 500 or more.

Many patriotic citizens are distributing these books in large quantities in soldiers' and sailors' encampments—a useful hint to you.

FOR CHRISTMAS: Two New Sunday School Services
"Good Will" and "The Guiding Star";
And a Service with Orchestration, "OUR KING"

Sample copies of all three of the above services sent postpaid for 10c. No free samples.

Solo and Duet Books

Soloists and duetists will welcome with delight the three new Rodeheaver publications listed below.
Rodeheaver Duets.
Rodeheaver Solos—High Voice.
Rodeheaver Solos—Low Voice.
Sixteen pages of high-class music in each book; octavo size, beautifully printed and bound. Easily dollar value for only 25c per copy, postpaid.

Penny Object Lessons

Object lessons for children, compiled by Rev. C. H. Woolston, founder of the Penny Concerts in America, and one of the greatest object teachers this country has produced; Frank B. Lane and Homer A. Rodeheaver, both of whom are unsurpassed in the line of platform work. Under five heads: "How to Catch the Eye," "How to Reach the Heart," "How to Convince the Mind," "How to Simplify the Truth" and "How to Remember the Message." 25c per copy.

RODEHEAVER'S CHRISTMAS RECITATIONS

A 32-page booklet edited by Chas. H. Gabriel and contributed to by all the leading writers. Contains poems and prose readings, drills, class exercises, etc. A very useful manual for preparing your Christmas program. 15c, postpaid. No copies on approval.

FIRST PICTURE

DO you know a Bible verse to fit what this first picture shows? If you do not, then couldn't you find an appropriate verse in our handy list of only about 2,000 verses, called International Bible Readings?

THIRTY Pictures will comprise the complete National Bible Picture Study series. $5,000.00 in cash rewards will be given those who select, from our easily acceptable list of verses, those that fit the thirty pictures best.

Complete Study Outfit

Below is a small reproduction of International Bible Readings, the list of about 2,000 Bible verses from which you will choose the best for the 30 pictures. All 30 pictures will appear in the Christian Herald.

THE CHRISTIAN HERALD begins today its third Bible Picture Study. Starting in this issue and continuing through 15 issues we will publish one or more Study pictures each week, until the 30 pictures have appeared. We invite every person to enter, to experience the great spiritual benefit of this Study, to seek to win a cash reward. The older members of the family and the children, too, will find great comfort, extraordinary interest and pleasure, and perhaps a fine cash prize in this unique home competition.

More Than Ever a Home Competition

Our first two Bible Picture Studies were received with widespread delight, and in them 100,000 of our friends found pleasure and profit.

But this third Study exceeds them both in interest, for it embodies a more definite plan of study, by the same fascinating pictorial method.

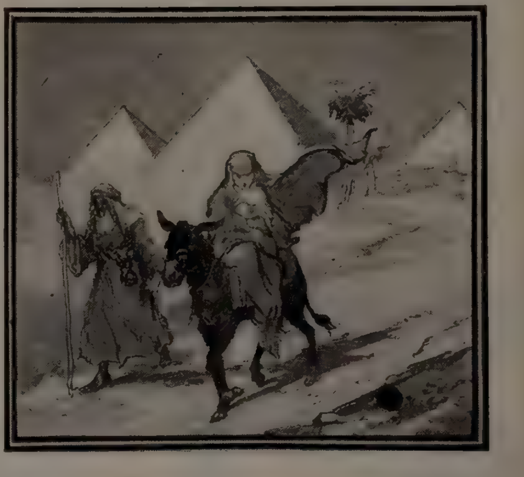
The reference book in this Study is nothing less than a word-for-word presentation of the Bible verses which comprise the International Sunday School Lessons, the Daily Home Bible Readings, and the Golden Texts for the months of December, 1917, and January, February, March and April of 1918—a series of Bible verse groups, each telling its own blessed story, selected from the Bible by the Lessons Committee of the International Sunday School Association! This reference book, called International Bible Readings, is shown to the left.

Help the Children—And Be Helped

Parents! If in the past you have not done your full share in reading over and explaining the Sabbath lessons for your children, then secure the Study Outfit, go with them over the interesting pictures and the priceless Bible verses. You will teach—and be taught. You will revive your own knowledge and understanding of the Bible, while your children will be acquiring a store of Bible truths which they would obtain in no other way. And they will, at the same time, be learning their actual weekly Sabbath lessons! The knowledge will come to you and them almost unconsciously, too. While enjoying the quest you will be learning, without realizing how greatly you gain.

Teachers! How could you better prepare for your Lessons than by reading them over here, word for word, and comparing with them the 30 Study pictures? For you, too, the International Bible Readings is valuable in itself, for it is not a list of the Lessons by references, but the actual Bible verses themselves, printed in full.

An Object Lesson



How to Fit a Verse to a Picture

Directly above is an example picture, to show you how to fit a verse to a picture. Just as we will now do in this case you will do for each picture of the National Bible Picture Study.

What Bible incident, what Bible thought, does the picture bring to mind? In looking through the selected list of only 2,000 Bible verses comprised in International Bible Readings, wouldn't you decide that this Bible verse fits the scene well:

> When he arose, he took the young child and his mother by night, and departed into Egypt.—Matt. 2 : 14.

Now look again at Study picture No. 1, above. Couldn't you find a verse to fit it, in International Bible Readings?

Enter the fascinating Bible Picture Study—at once! Study the Bible by the picture method.

Christian Herald Prayer League

ALL Christians are urged to unite with the members of the Prayer League in daily prayer at the noon hour. Also any one is at liberty to send a request for prayer or an acknowledgment of answered prayer, thereby becoming enrolled as a member of the Prayer League.

THERE is something peculiarly fitting in the evening call to prayer. For Christians it takes the place of the evening sacrifice of the Jews. The day is done. Whatever may have been the hopes and plans and fears of the morning, the day has brought the answer or the fulfilment. Hopes are dissolved in realization, plans are resolved in accomplishment, and fears have once more proven baseless. Our tasks are done, our minds are clear, our bodies are tired with honest toil, and our prayers rise like the incense of the one-time sacrifice, expressing our thanks to the good Father above for the victories of the day and our faith in his watchful care through the night just following and the days to come. The very thought of vespers and evening prayer is a comfort to the heart. In the evening prayer the cares, the worries, the trials and disappointments of the day are softened and transformed, and we rise from our knees strengthened, rested and ready for a quiet, happy evening and a night of rest and sleep.

Will the young woman who wrote to the Prayer League regarding the unwelcome attentions of her employer please correspond with Miss Christine Dahne, the secretary of the Prayer League. Work is plentiful in New York. No girl need submit to indignities.

Prayers are asked for revivals of religion at:

Dodge Center, Minn.; Quebec, Canada; Mount Sterling, Ky. (that many may be saved during revival); Nashville, Tenn. (for an outpouring of the Holy Spirit upon a mission); Montrose, Pa. (that Pennsylvania may be voted dry, also for the election of a dry judge); Cincinnati, Ohio (that Ohio may be voted dry).

Mrs. S. E. B., Jones Prairie, Texas, asks prayer that a pastor may be sent to take the place of the retiring pastor, and that he may be blessed in his new field of work.

E. R. H. and Mrs. F. B. ask prayer that sons' minds may be restored; Mrs. M. L. H., that husband's mind may be restored; D. S., that wife's and own mind may be strengthened; nine friends, for mental restoration.

Mrs. A. E. P. asks prayer that husband's sight may be restored; three parents, that their daughters' sight may be restored; Mrs. L. L., that sister's sight may be restored; M. B. G., that brother's sight may be restored.

A. M. G. asks prayer that mother's hearing may be restored; two wives, that their husbands' sight may be restored; four friends, for restoration of hearing.

Twenty friends ask prayer for a deeper work of grace, assurance of sins forgiven, or express in other ways their desire for personal spiritual blessing.

Mrs. A. D. asks prayer that son may be cured of the liquor habit; A. H., that a doctor may be fully cured of the liquor habit; Miss E. M. N., that a man and his wife may be cured of the liquor habit; Mrs. H. E., that son may be cured of the tobacco habit; Mrs. C. F., that a friend may be cured of the tobacco habit.

Sixteen friends ask prayer for help or guidance in financial matters.

Nineteen friends ask prayer for the granting of various desires and needs.

Acknowledgments of answered prayer have been received from the following:

A. M., Jeannette, Pa.; Mrs. J. L. H., Yuma Boundary Line, Ariz.; I. A. V., Quenemo, Kan.; Mrs. E. A., Manchester, Ill.; E. D. F., Mobile, Ala.; Mrs. H. G. S., Bruin, Pa. L. M. D., Limona, Fla.; M. R., New Orleans; La.; M. H., Grooville, N. Y.; Mrs. M. T., W., Bloomington, Ill.; Mrs. W. M., Stratford, N. H.; A Worker, Leesburg, Ohio; Mrs. H. G. J., Henderson, Ky.

I Can Brighten Your Life!

What would it be worth to have health—untiring energy, buoyant spirits, perfect figure, clear complexion and the right weight for one of your stature?

Think how it would brighten your life, enable you to work without fatigue; how your capacity for enjoyment would be multiplied; and what charm it would add to your personality!

This is my life work. I have done these very things for 80,000 other women, many of whom were weak, frail, depressed and discouraged. I have made them, oh, so well! Leading physicians endorse my methods. Their wives and daughters are my pupils. Treatment in your own home—private and confidential.

Does it sound "too good to be true?" Tell me your difficulties and I will tell you, without cost, how you can overcome them—without drugs; without great expense or delay. I have had a wonderful experience and I want to tell you about it.

If you have any of the following derangements, run a line through it and send it to me:
Excess Flesh in any part of body
Thin Bust, Chest, Neck or Arms
Round Shoulders
Incorrect Standing
Incorrect Walking
Poor Complexion
Poor Circulation
Lame Back
Sleeplessness
Lack of Reserve
Nervousness
Constipation

Vapo-Cresolene

"USED WHILE YOU SLEEP"

The Inhalation Treatment for Whooping-Cough, Spasmodic Croup, Colds, Catarrh, Asthma, Bronchitis, Coughs.

Established 1879

Simple, safe and effective, avoiding internal drugs.

Vaporized Cresolene relieves the paroxysms of Whooping-Cough and Spasmodic Croup at once; it nips the common cold before it has a chance of developing into something worse, and experience shows that a neglected cold is a dangerous cold.

Mrs. Ballington Booth says: "No family, where there are young children, should be without this lamp."

The air carrying the antiseptic vapor, inhaled with every breath, makes breathing easy and relieves the congestion, assuring restful nights.

It is called a boon by Asthma sufferers.

For the bronchial complications of Scarlet Fever and Measles, and as an aid in the treatment of Diphtheria, Cresolene is valuable on account of its powerful germicidal qualities.

It is a protection to those exposed.

Cresolene's best recommendation is its 38 years of successful use.

Sold by Druggists. Send for descriptive booklet. Try Cresolene Antiseptic Throat Tablets for the irritated throat, composed of slippery elm bark, licorice, sugar and Cresolene. They can't harm you. Of your druggist or from us, 10c. in stamps.

Disciples of Christ in Convention

By Rev. S. T. Willis

THE annual convention of the missionary societies of the Disciples of Christ at Kansas City, in the closing days of October, was one of unusual interest. The attendance was the largest since the Pittsburg Centennial in 1909. There were about 15,000 people present at some of the sessions (possibly 20,000 at the communion service); and the delegates numbered at least 10,000.

Reports of work done and moneys received and disbursed were the best ever presented. The nine treasuries, representing world-wide missions, church extension, benevolence, temperance and education showed total receipts of one million and three-quarters—a gain of nearly $200,000 in the past year with more missionaries at work than ever.

Another matter of special interest was the satisfactory progress of the Men and Millions Movement, which has been in the field now three years and has raised in that time something over four and a half millions of dollars for missions and education, and secured the enlistment of nearly one thousand new recruits for the mission fields of the world. They have set their stakes for the completion of the task—the raising of $6,300,000—by June, 1918. Two things were done looking toward this end: the raising of one million in ten-thousand-dollar subscriptions, and the personal pledge of Mr. R. A. Long to give another one hundred thousand in addition to his million already given.

PERHAPS one of the most interesting things of all was the unanimous adoption by the convention of a new constitution, by which the name and operations of future conventions will be changed. No longer will this great annual gathering be known as The General Christian Missionary Convention, but it will be "The International Convention of the Disciples of Christ."

A NEW feature is the creation of an advisory council of about 150 men, to be appointed by the several State Missionary Conventions (about three from each state), which shall sit in session each day of the national convention, pass upon all questions of policy, and act in an advisory capacity to the convention.

All seemed to think a new day is dawning, not only because of the harmony of thought and action relative to the new organization under a new constitution, but also because of the steps taken toward the unification of the several missionary boards.

ANOTHER feature altogether new was the hearing of "fraternal delegations" from several denominations on the vital and paramount issue of Christian Union. Possibly the cause of Christian Union was helped forward a good bit by this session, which happened to come on a Sunday evening and was attended by 15,000 people.

PERHAPS the most thrilling moment of the convention came at the close of a masterly address by ex-Governor Hanly of Indiana, who mercilessly arraigned the liquor traffic, and called on President Wilson to exercise the power Congress had given him to put a stop to the entire traffic in this country. Fifteen thousand men and women stood up in favor of sending such a request to the President, and it was telegraphed to Washington that night.

One great dominant note sounded out through all sessions, in all addresses, in every appeal and report: that the times demand a new dedication of self and service for the evangelization and the Christian reconstruction of the world.

Two new policies were adopted that look toward greater things along certain lines of general Christian interest. One was the appointment of a commission to make a special study of the downtown church problem. The other was the adoption of a system of ministerial pensions.

The next convention goes to Fort Worth, Texas, in the autumn of 1918.

RULES of the CHRISTIAN HERALD NATIONAL BIBLE PICTURE STUDY

1.—The purpose of the National Bible Picture Study is to promote more widespread Bible reading, and deeper thought of what is read.

2.—It consists of a series of 30 pictures, which are published in the Christian Herald, and of a book of selected Bible verses, called International Bible Readings. Participants are to submit a set of answers consisting of at least one and not more than five verses for each picture: the verses to be chosen from those contained in International Bible Readings. Participants will be offered a bound set of reply forms, called the Answer Book, in which to write the verses they select for the pictures.

3.—Cash rewards totaling $5,000.00 will be awarded by the Christian Herald to those participants in the National Bible Picture Study who submit the 1001 most complete sets of verses best fitted to the pictures. These rewards, as announced, will be awarded in order to the highest ranking participants.

4.—Rank or merit will be accorded to participants primarily according to which set of verses contains the greatest number of best verses for the pictures. If there should be an equality between two or among more than two participants upon this basic requirement, then the award will be made according to superiority in the following requirements, each being necessary only in case there is an equality on the preceding point: (a) the least number of incorrect—the verses which are not best—answers; (b) the highest relative position of the participant's correct verses in the aggregate among the participant's complete set of verses, as when three verses are given by a participant for one picture the correct verse is on top rather than in the position of second or third choice among the verses submitted for that picture; (c) the least number of words in the whole set of verses; and (d) the least number of letters in the complete set of verses. In the event of a tie, after the above named requirements have been applied, then each tying participant will receive the full reward tied for.

5.—The National Bible Picture Study is open to everybody everywhere, except employees of the Christian Herald and of other publishers announcing the Study, and members of their immediate families. One participant may send in as many as three separate sets of verses; but each set will be judged by itself, and only one set submitted by any person (that person's best set) may receive a reward. Each member of a family (at one address) may submit as many as three separate sets of verses, but only one reward will be awarded in one family at one address.

6.—The word "best" will be interpreted to mean "that which excels or surpasses in the matter of being a fitting text for a particular picture." The verse should fit, or suit, or be applicable to the picture as completely and specifically as possible. What is seen in the picture should correspond with the words of the verses supplied, there being no requirement of historical or doctrinal accuracy. Let the participant describe what is seen in the picture, by using a verse (or verses) contained in International Bible Readings. The verse may describe only part of the picture; or the picture may illustrate only a part of the verse. The text which matches the picture the closest, according to the foregoing explanation, will be recorded as the best.

7.—A committee of Judges, consisting of disinterested persons of recognized honor and capability, will judge the fitness of verses submitted for the pictures and select the best, according to the Rules. Their decisions will be final.

8.—If two or more verses submitted for any picture should be found by the Judges to be equally more fitting than the other verses which have been submitted for that picture, then each of such two or more equally superior verses will be recorded jointly, as a unit, "best," as defined in Rule 6.

9.—The reference book of Bible verses, called International Bible Readings, and the official set of reply forms, called the Answer Book, comprise the Bible Picture Study Outfit, together with any pictures that have been published, if these be desired. The possession of the Outfit is a convenience, not an obligation. The Outfit is obtainable in connection with subscription as separately announced. If the convenient Outfit is not obtained, a participant may make use of the Bible itself, in church, home or library, by obtaining gratuitously from the Christian Herald the references by chapter and verse corresponding to the official and standard list of verses contained in International Bible Readings; and each verse for every picture must be submitted on a separate reply form, a sheet of paper about 5 x 8 inches in size, on the upper part of which the participant has made by pen or pencil a fair facsimile or copy of the particular picture, and on the lower part of which he or she has written one verse for the picture, and name and address. If two or more verses are submitted for one picture, the verse which the participant considers the best is to be placed on top and the others in order below, the figure one in parentheses, thus (1), to be marked on the left of the participant's verse, the figure two (2) in the same manner for the next best, and so on.

10.—The first picture in the National Bible Picture Study will be published in the issue of the Christian Herald of November 28, 1917, and the final picture in the Christian Herald of March 6, 1918. Participants may order Outfits up to and including April 22, 1918. Orders mailed or tendered after that date will not be filled. Participants may submit Sets of Answers after April 22, 1918, but not later than May 31, 1918—which is the last day for submitting answers. Sets of Answers sent by mail must be mailed not later than May 31, 1918. Sets of Answers sent by express must be delivered at the express office on or before May 31, 1918. Participants who present Sets of Answers at the Christian Herald office personally or by personal messenger must do so before 5 P. M., May 31, 1918. Every Answer Book (or list) is to be submitted in the name of and with the correct address of the person who did the studying. Verses may be written in ink, by pencil, or by typewriter. The participant must keep a duplicate set or record of the verses he or she submits. Participants are allowed to receive casual, gratuitous aid from relatives, teachers or other friends, but shall not buy, or sell, or barter information. Any infraction of the Rules may subject the entry to debarment; and the Christian Herald may reject any entry upon convincing evidence of unfairness. As soon as practicable after the conclusion of the Study the Committee of Judges will make a full report, which will be published, with the names of the winners.

What Keeps the Gears Silent?

Smooth, silent operation of rear axle gears is one of the great objectives of the car builder's engineer.

He specifies gears mechanically and mathematically correct, but he must also provide one other essential—protection against wear.

The big ring gear has the whole dead weight of the car dragging it back. The little pinion gear at the end of the propeller shaft says it must go forward.

If the bearings supporting these gears wear loose, under pressure of conflicting forces, the pinion will climb on the ring gear, and the latter will be thrown out of perpendicular position.

When gears work out of mesh they begin to wear—and the more they wear the faster they wear and the noisier they become.

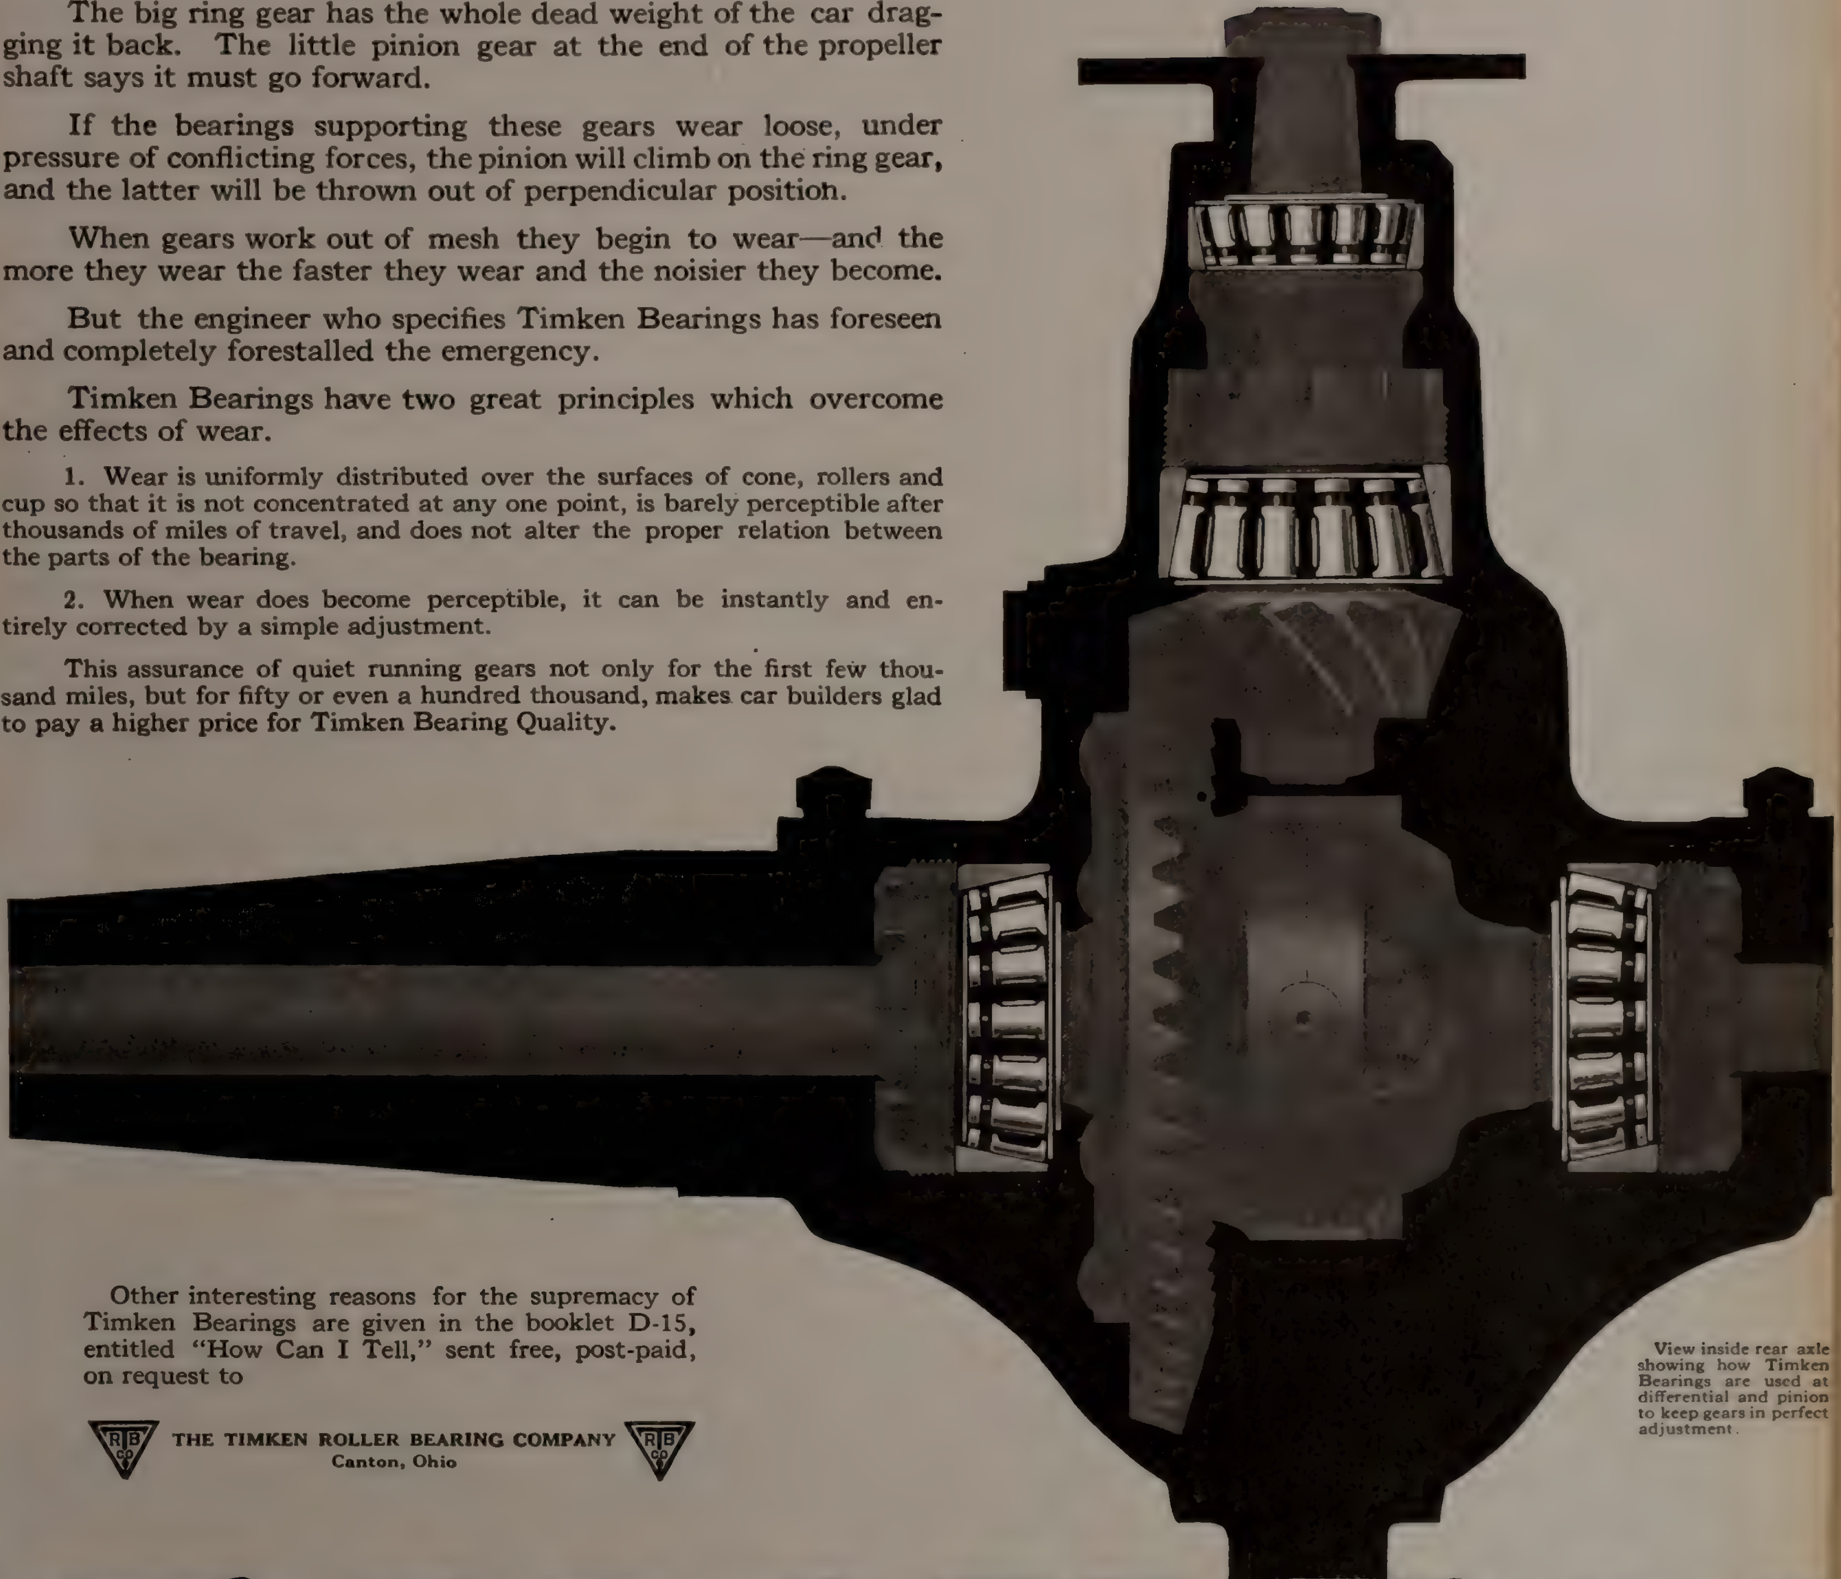
But the engineer who specifies Timken Bearings has foreseen and completely forestalled the emergency.

Timken Bearings have two great principles which overcome the effects of wear.

1. Wear is uniformly distributed over the surfaces of cone, rollers and cup so that it is not concentrated at any one point, is barely perceptible after thousands of miles of travel, and does not alter the proper relation between the parts of the bearing.

2. When wear does become perceptible, it can be instantly and entirely corrected by a simple adjustment.

This assurance of quiet running gears not only for the first few thousand miles, but for fifty or even a hundred thousand, makes car builders glad to pay a higher price for Timken Bearing Quality.



View inside rear axle showing how Timken Bearings are used at differential and pinion to keep gears in perfect adjustment.

Other interesting reasons for the supremacy of Timken Bearings are given in the booklet D-15, entitled "How Can I Tell," sent free, post-paid, on request to PERHAPS no article in home furnishings is selected with such care, thought and deliberation as a rug. And it is equally true that no article receives so little worth-while attention after it comes into the home. Sweeping, or at the best, vacuum cleaning, must suffice while almost everything else not only is dusted but kept as bright as new with soap and water.

Most people hesitate to clean rugs because they think the work requires special skill and secret methods. This probably is true if the rug is dirty through and through. Usually, however, only the surface is soiled. Then, as with numerous other seemingly impossible tasks, the cleaning can be done at home as often as necessary without professional help and at nominal cost by the judicious use of Ivory Soap.

To Clean Carpets and Rugs

Sweep thoroughly. Then, beginning at the corner farthest from the door, scatter Ivory Soap Paste (see directions inside wrapper) over not more than a square yard at a time. Scrub vigorously with a stiff scrubbing brush. Scrape off the paste with a metal-edged ruler or a piece of zinc. Wipe thoroughly with a cloth wrung out of clean, lukewarm water. Work with—not against—the nap. Use water sparingly.

No matter how delicate the colors may be, this treatment can do nothing but restore them to their original beauty. For water, used sparingly as suggested, will not injure them, and Ivory Soap cannot harm anything that water itself does not harm.

AN ILLUSTRATED NEWS WEEKLY FOR THE HOME

On the Grand Canal, the main street of Venice, famed in song and story, the goal of every traveler in times of peace.

The Struggle to Save Venice

ONE of the mightiest conflicts of the war is now raging in northern Italy, with the fate of Venice and the entire province of Venetia depending on the result. Three monarchs are watching the momentous issue, the emperors of Austria-Hungary and Bulgaria, and the king of Italy. The campaign of the invaders is directed by General Mackensen, whose irresistible drives in other areas of the great war have already become famous, and that of the Italians by Generals Diaz and Cadorna, the brilliant Italian leaders, associated with whom is General Fayolle, one of the ablest military commanders of France and a hero of the Somme. On the Teutonic side are arrayed with Mackensen's veterans the flower of the Austro-Hungarian armies, and also strong forces from Bulgaria, Turkey, and Greece—the latter being the troops of Kavala who surrendered to the Bulgarians early in the Salonica campaign. On the Italian side the native troops and artillery have been reinforced by the Allies, but to what extent is not definitely known.

Back and forth these mighty masses have struggled among the mountains of northern Italy, alternately losing ground and regaining it. Some of the mountain peaks have changed hands as many as four times. The Italians have fought with desperate stubbornness, as, if Monte Grappa, Monte Tomba and Monte Monfenera are taken, it may involve a withdrawal of the defensive battle-front from the Piave to the last stand at the Adige River. Unless that can be successfully maintained, the greater part of the province of Venetia will be lost to Italy.

The whole world is naturally interested in the fate of "Venice the Beautiful." Civilization shrinks at the suggestion of the possibilities of a bombardment, remembering the fate that has befallen other cities in the present war. Austria-Hungary has demanded to know whether Venice is armed. It has been stated, though not officially, that troops would be withdrawn from the city, and that no attempt would be made to defend it, if such defense would involve the demolition of priceless works of art.

Meanwhile the invading armies are being reinforced by the addition of troops released from the front in Russia, who are being hurried forward to aid in the climacteric struggle on the mountains and plains of northern Italy. With indomitable courage, the Italians are endeavoring to hold their line, but the fate of Venice may be decided even before this issue of the Christian Herald reaches the hands of our readers.

Against the sweep of the invaders the Italians are contesting every foot of the ground, from the mountain passes of the north to the Asiago plateau, yielding only before overwhelmingly superior numbers and not always then. Strong Italian bases at Quero and Monte Cornelle were taken by storm by the Teutonic forces. Monte Tomba, an especially strong position, was also carried by the Germans after hard fighting. On the lower Piave River, where the Italians made a stubborn stand, many lives were sacrificed on both sides along the thirty-mile battle-front. Quick-firers, battleplanes, heavy artillery and masses of infantry were employed at different points along the widely extended lines of this conflict. At Sega Mills, some of the bloodiest fighting occurred; yet when the battle was over, the mill wheel was still running and the water flowing peacefully, while all around were evidences of fearful carnage and heaps of corpses. In the inundated territory, which the Italians flooded by opening the sluices to check the invaders, the tops of corn-stalks could be seen above the five-foot depth of water and also traces of submerged vineyards. Bodies of Austrian dead floated on the surface, and the carnage along both banks of the Piave was so great, according to the Italian reports, that the dead were left unburied where they fell.

It is only a few months ago since Dr. Alexander Robertson, writing from Venice to the Christian Herald, told how "The City of the Adriatic" kept watch over its towers and palaces for enemies in the sky. Now, however, the comparatively languid interest of the dwellers in the city of the Doges, and of the foreign sojourners there, has been changed to panic at the threatening advance of the Teutonic armies from the north. Von Mackensen's impetuous leadership has overridden all obstacles, conquered the mountain passes, invaded the Italian plains, and any day news may come that the enemy is hammering at the gates of Venice.

According to the Associated Press dispatches, eastern Venetia is entirely overrun by the invader. It is not improbable, however, that Venice may escape the fate of many other European cities that have been devastated in the present war, and that its beautiful structures may be saved from bombardment. Many days ago, according to the cabled reports, it was decided that if the city's fall became inevitable, armed resistance would not be offered, and in view of this purpose it was planned to remove the troops and batteries so that the city might not be subjected to bombardment. If this has been done, Venice may be spared the fate of Rheims, Louvain, Brussels, and other cities. ▶

Venice has a wonderful history, which runs back for thirteen centuries or more. The Grand Canal, the center of Venetian life, is perhaps the most picturesque water highway in the world. Many famous writers have essayed its description and it has been the inspiration of painters innumerable. It is the key to all that is finest and most venerable in Venetian life. The whole city, beautiful as it is, gives the impression of a great museum of the past. Its day of splendor has long since gone by, and it lives on its memories. Its famous churches and squares, its shop-keepers and gondoliers, and even its beggars, are all distinctive. Its population "seem to be the custodians and ushers of a great museum of which the Piazza San Marco is the lobby." The architecture of Venice is largely Byzantine, and to artists it is an endless attraction, full of atmospheric color, with barbaric tints, a peerlessly blue sky and dazzling perspectives. Everything that is quaint and charming to the eye is found there; buildings that give the suggestion of the days of the Montagues and Capulets and of the grand processionals of the Doges; but the pomp and luxury, the freshness and youth and beauty are faded. Libraries, palaces, bridges, and even the statuary, magnificent as it is, are reminders of the glories of other days.

Venice has been aptly described as "the one city that is still victorious over time; and despite her age, the City of the Sea is fascinating even yet. She has successfully defied a dozen centuries; she may perhaps defy a dozen more. All other cities in the world resemble one another, but Venice remains unique. She is the city of romance—the only place on earth today where poetry conquers prose. The marriage of the Adriatic and its bride has never been dissolved." Her streets are waterways, her vehicles boats. Titian, Tintoretto and a score of other famous artists have decorated her with their genius; the spell of her beauty is felt by all who visit her. Her cathedrals and palaces are unsurpassed; her libraries and art collections alone would have made her famous. It is this beautiful city which rests upon a hundred islands linked by over four hundred bridges, reposing like a splendid jewel upon the bosom of the sea, that is the great prize for which the invading Teutonic armies are now contending.

The peaceful inhabitants of northern Italy who sought refuge from the barbarian invaders on the marshy islands of the Adriatic Sea, little dreamed that they were founding a republic which should fill a large page in the world's history. These refugees, in the latter part of the seventh century, organized by electing a ruler whom they called a doge, or duke. Although he was chosen by universal suffrage, the government soon assumed the form of an oligarchy, in which none could rule but members of certain aristocratic families. Venice maintained her independence, and developed a powerful navy, which in time dominated the Adriatic; next she made the Mediterranean a Venetian lake, and later absorbed a large part of the trade of the world, carrying their commerce from the British Isles on the north, to China and India on the east. Venice rendered valiant service with her fleets in the Crusades, carrying the warriors of the Cross to the Holy Land, and when the Byzantine Empire fell to pieces, she acquired many of its fragments.

Toward the end of the tenth century Venice in a short war cleared the Adriatic Sea of pirates. In 1171 the doge sent an expedition against the Byzantine emperor, but it was compelled to return by an outbreak of plague. In 1204 Venice took Constantinople. From 1298, when the Venetians were defeated by the Genoese, until 1379, when the Genoese fleet, after penetrating into the lagoon of Venice, was driven out in a desperate battle, the two maritime republics were engaged in uninterrupted war. Venice conquered Vicenza, Feltre and Bassano in 1388; Padua and Verona in 1405; Udine and Friuli in 1420; Brescia in 1426; Bergamo in 1427; Crema in 1449; Rovigo in 1484, and Cremona in 1499.

In the fifteenth and sixteenth centuries Venice was in almost uninterrupted conflict with the Turks, a contest which she waged single-handed. Her history from the fifteenth to the eighteenth century was marked by wars with Turkey, France and other powers. What a combination of European powers could not do, the genius of History accomplished, through the discovery of the route to India by way of the Cape of Good Hope, which gave to Portugal the monopoly of the Oriental trade which Venice had held by virtue of her possession of the eastern end of the Mediterranean and the portage of Suez.

In 1797 Napoleon Bonaparte, then a general in the service of the French republic, took possession of Venice. In 1814 she passed into the possession of Austria, of which she remained a part until the allied Prussians and Italians in 1866 gave her freedom, and the unity of Italy was accomplished, save for the Papal States, the taking of which completed the work of Garibaldi in 1870.

Progress of the War

By ANTHONY ARNOUX

AT almost the very end of the week of November 15 to November 22, the British made a tremendous attack on the German lines on that part of the western front which stretches south from a point on the Scarpe River a few miles east of Arras to the city of St. Quentin, a distance of about thirty-two miles. This attack, the troops employed in which were apparently all British, began at an early hour in the morning of November 21, without any artillery preparation whatever. This lack of preliminary preparation has been a feature of the last few British drives on the western front, but never before has an attack on such a wide front been made without it.

On the northern and southern ends of the battle-front the gains made by the British were not of very great importance; in fact, in many sectors there were no gains at all. But for a distance of five miles north and south of Cambrai, in the center of the British attacking line, serious and important advances were made, which, if followed up hereafter successfully, may have a very marked effect in modifying, in a sense favorable to the British, the whole German position from Arras to St. Quentin, and even farther to the east.

THE Hindenburg line is the name commonly given to the German positions on the western front extending in a general southeasterly direction from Lens, that much-fought-over Belgian town, to just north of Rheims, in Champagne. This line of defense is buttressed in its course by certain important strongly fortified towns, which not only act as buttresses, but by reason of their situation as regards transportation facilities form bases of supplies as well. These towns, or to be more accurate these fortified areas, are from north to south successively: Douai, Cambrai, Le Catelet, St. Quentin, La Fère, Laon and Neufchatel. Between these places runs, sometimes a considerable distance to the west of, and sometimes on a straight line connecting each pair of towns, a rather flexible chain of minor defensive positions, protected by trenches, wire, etc., and near enough together so that their artilleries can completely command the ground between them.

To break, then, the so-called Hindenburg line, it is evident that it would be necessary to drive the Teutons out of one of these defensive buttresses before attempting to force a way through the subsidiary defense line to the north and south of such buttress. A breach in the subsidiary defense line would be necessarily on such a scale that it would be possible to pour through the breach made by the shock troops a sufficiently strong force of infantry, and particularly artillery, to keep the breach open. Hence, in order to make any permanent breach in the Teutonic line of defense, it appears absolutely necessary to take one of the buttresses of that line, and then, attacking north and south of such buttress, to make a breach sufficiently wide to be kept open.

THE important result of the new British offensive is that by it the British, for the first time since the Hindenburg line has been established, won ground which places them in a favorable position from which to attack one of these buttresses. This particular buttress is Cambrai. North, west and south of this town, in this drive the British drove forward distances varying from two to five miles, and held the ground thus captured. This brought their lines to positions which so encircle Cambrai in these directions that it will be relatively easy for them to make a serious attempt, with reasonable possibilities of success, to wrest the town from the Teutons.

If successful, and if the British enter Cambrai, this can hardly fail to have a seriously modifying influence on the whole German position. Not only will it be possible for the British to extend the breach which would be created by this capture to the north and south, but this will also aid them in their subsequent attack on the buttresses to the north and south of Cambrai, since it will add another direction from which the latter can be attacked. In the whole operation the British report the capture of some 10,000 prisoners and about thirty guns. During the time this British attack was proceeding, the French opened a supporting offensive on that portion of their front which immediately joins the British line to the south.

IN Palestine, the British continued to advance, and are, at the close of the week, approaching Jerusalem. Its capture, while of enormous importance from the viewpoint of religious feeling, and also of considerable weight in a military sense, would not be considered as marking the achievement of the British objective in this campaign.

The British Admiralty report of the U-boat sinkings took a decided jump upward last week from the record low week preceding. The Germans have proclaimed an extension of their zone of operations to include the Azores and the adjacent waters.

IN Russia the interior situation seems growing worse, as far as any hopes of a stable government being soon established are concerned. Kerensky seems to have been permanently eliminated from consideration as a factor, but the Lenine government which overthrew him does not appear to be exercising any real control, except in the two cities of Petrograd and Moscow, and even in these towns its position seems to be none too secure. That government has, however, officially notified all the belligerents of its purpose to negotiate for an armistice of three months, preliminary to a "democratic peace."

The Diet of the Ukraine has declared the Ukraine an independent nation, and has ordered the Ukrainian troops now on the eastern battle-line, who number some 360,000, to leave the front, which order it is stated these troops are now obeying. The elimination of Russia as a belligerent will almost inevitably eliminate Rumania as well. That country, two-thirds conquered, can hardly continue to fight, deprived of all supplies from the outside and also of all aid from Russia.

The political situation in all the Allied countries has grown calmer. The new ministry in France has taken office, Orlando has been continued as prime minister in Italy for the time being, and Lloyd George has successfully resisted the attacks made on his plans and policies in Parliament.

The Millennium: When, What and Where?

By REV. JAMES M. GRAY, D.D., Dean of the Moody Bible Institute of Chicago

I

THE Christian Herald has asked that the previous series of articles on "The Mountain Peaks of Prophecy" be supplemented with another on the Millennium. Considerable was said on that subject as the articles progressed, but nothing in the way of a sustained or continuous treatment such as would interest and instruct a beginner in the study of prophecy.

The word "Millennium" is a combination of two Latin words, mille, a thousand, and annus, a year, and means a thousand years. In its Biblical or theological use, it finds its origin in Revelation 20 : 1-7, where it is employed six times in speaking of such coming and momentous events as the binding of Satan in the bottomless pit, "that he should deceive the nations no more till the thousand years should be fulfilled," and the resurrection of the saints who shall reign with Christ over the earth during the same period.

However, while this is the only place in Scripture where the "thousand years" is named specifically, yet nevertheless the period itself is identified in many ways throughout the Bible. Indeed, the Fleming H. Revell Company once published a goodly-sized volume by the distinguished Bible scholar, Dr. Nathaniel West, entitled, "The Thousand Years in Both Testaments," from whose opening pages we quote the following:

> What we find in the New Testament as its outcome in respect to the ages and the kingdom, has already lain in the bosom of the Old Testament from the beginning. The closing part of the New Testament (Revelation 20 : 1-7 for example) is but the full flower of which the opening part of the Old Testament was the precious seed, the kingdom, one and the same in essence all the way. Nothing appears in the later revelation that was not hid in the earlier; nothing in John that was not in Moses. . . . Such is the organic and genetic character of revelation and of prophecy, that if "the thousand years" are not in Moses, the Psalms and the Prophets, they have no right to be in John.

II

THE task would be fascinating to trace from the beginning the prophecies of the Bible which point to that "good time coming" which we call the Millennium.

Take the earliest of all, in Gen. 3 : 15, where it is promised that the Seed of the woman shall bruise the serpent's head. In one of our former articles, it was shown that this "Seed" is Jesus Christ, and the "serpent," Satan, the bruising of whose head means the destruction of his power longer to hurt men. This at once parallels the verse in Revelation, which speaks of him as being bound and shut up in the bottomless pit a thousand years. His final doom is not reached even then; but if for a thousand years he is restrained from doing evil in the earth, think what that will mean in the peace and happiness of mankind! This is one of the features of the Millennium.

We pass to that other promise, attached to the call of Abraham in Gen. 12 : 3, "in thee all the families of the earth shall be blessed." We saw in former studies the extent to which "all the families of the earth" are already blessed in Abraham, whose Seed is Jesus Christ; but we also saw that this was only a part of that blessing which is yet to be, and which approaches nearer its fulfilment in that same Millennium.

Hastening to the time of David, Abraham's kingly offspring, we listen to the Messiah saying in the second Psalm, "I will declare the decree: Jehovah hath said unto me, Thou art my Son; this day have I begotten thee. Ask of me, and I will give thee the nations for thine inheritance, and the uttermost parts of the earth for thy possession." This points to the same period, and shows us our blessed Lord reigning over the whole earth, with all of the peace and righteousness upon the earth which that implies.

The prophet Isaiah comments upon this reign, saying, "He shall not judge after the sight of his eyes, neither decide after the hearing of his ears; but with righteousness shall he judge the poor, and decide with equity for the meek of the earth." The blessing extends to the animal creation too, for we remember the familiar words of the same prophet, "The wolf also shall dwell with the lamb, and the leopard shall lie down with the kid; and the calf and the young lion and the fatling together; and a little child shall lead them" (11 : 3-6).

Israel, or the Jew, will be specially favored at that time, for, as Amos says, "In that day will I raise up the tabernacle of David [i.e. restore his kingdom], and I will build it as in the days of old. . . . Behold, the days come, saith Jehovah, that the plowman shall overtake the reaper, and the treader of grapes him that soweth seed, and the mountains shall drop sweet wine, and all the hills shall melt. And I will bring again the captivity of my people Israel, and they shall build the waste cities, and inhabit them; and they shall plant vineyards and drink the wine thereof; and they shall also make gardens, and eat the fruit of them. And I will plant them upon their land, and they shall no more be plucked up out of their land which I have given them, saith the Lord thy God" (9 : 11-15).

II

THE joyous refrain is continued in the New Testament, and Jesus, in view of his coming crucifixion and death, instructs his disciples concerning self-denial, saying: "What is a man profited if he shall gain the whole world and lose his own soul? . . . For the Son of Man shall come in the glory of His Father and His angels; and then He shall reward every man according to his works." The second coming of our Lord is thus declared to be one of the features of the Millennium, and naturally the great feature; for, as we have seen previously, it is his coming alone that can introduce that period or make it a possibility. But he is coming to judge his people and to dispense to them the reward of their fidelity, which will make it a happy time for them.

In the Acts, Peter refers to it. He exhorts the unbelieving Jews who crucified their Lord to repent and be converted, that their sins might be blotted out. And then he adds: "That so there may come seasons of refreshing from the presence of the Lord, and that he may send the Messiah who hath been appointed for you, even Jesus, whom the heavens must receive until the time of restoration of all things, whereof God spake by the mouth of his holy prophets which have been since the world began." It is the time of the "restoration of all things," and yet not all things absolutely, but all those things of which the holy prophets have spoken, and which a consensus of their writings shows will be brought to fruition in the Millennium, when Jesus comes again (3 : 19-21).

Of course, the Epistles hold much of the same thought, but that thrilling revelation through Paul in the 8th of Romans challenges our attention first. He is comforting believers under "the sufferings of this present time," which "are not worthy to be compared with the glory which shall be revealed in us." And then he uses these words, so often quoted, but so little appreciated in their bearing on millennial conditions:

> For the earnest expectation of creation waiteth for the revealing of the sons of God. For the creation was subjected to vanity, not of its own will, but by reason of him who subjected it, in hope that the creation itself also shall be delivered from the bondage of corruption into the liberty of the glory of the children of God. For we know that the whole creation groaneth and travaileth in pain together until now. And not only so, but ourselves also, who have the first-fruits of the Spirit, even we ourselves groan within ourselves, waiting for our adoption, to wit, the redemption of our body.

This passage parallels that already quoted from Isaiah, pointing out that the earthly blessings it portrays are vitally associated with the resurrection of the saints.

Thus, not to prolong this running comment any further, we are brought once more to Rev. 20 : 1-7.

IV

THE reader is asked to carefully read this passage, and then answer the following question: Suppose it had now passed before your eyes for the first time, and suppose you were entirely free from any bias of mind concerning it, what would it naturally suggest to you? Would it not seem to teach at least eight things:

(1) That Satan will be bound and shut up in the bottomless pit a thousand years;

(2) That during this period the nations will not be deceived or misled by him;

(3) That thrones of judgment shall be occupied by risen saints and martyrs;

(4) That these shall live and reign as kings and priests with Christ;

(5) That the rest of the dead shall remain in their graves until the period is ended;

(6) That this is the first resurrection;

(7) That there is no more death for them that partake of its blessedness;

(8) That at its close Satan shall be loosed again.

This is the Millennium. This is the kingdom of the Messiah on this earth, which is predicted throughout the Old Testament. If we are intelligent in the Scriptures, this is what we mean every time we pray, "Thy kingdom come." This is how almost the whole Church understood these prophecies for the first three centuries of the Christian era. As another says, "It was not until Christians began to mistake the world's patronage of a corrupted Christianity for the commencement of the Millennium [i.e. at the fourth century in the days of Constantine], that they adopted those spiritualizing theories of interpretation which made these prophecies teach something else."

And what is that "something else" which they are thus made to teach? Namely, that the resurrection and the reigning of the saints and martyrs in this passage merely designates a revival of their spirit in the earth. They say it merely means the universal spread and predominance of the principles of Christianity for which they suffered. But, as the English writer quoted above asks: "How could such a revival or predominance of the principles of the martyrs be a reward for them, while as to their bodies they are still in the grave? Is this the reigning with Christ which is to more than compensate for their suffering with him? We think not."

Of course we are not now speaking of the eternal age. We are not speaking of the period following the Millennium, when, according to I Cor. 15 : 24-28, Christ will deliver up "the kingdom to God, even the Father." When that time comes, "then shall the Son also himself be subject unto him that put all things under him, that God may be all in all." But we are distinctly taught that his preceding (millennial) reign continues until then, and it is of this (millennial) reign that this present article treats. This is the reign promised to every one "that overcometh and keepeth my works unto the end," to whom he will "give authority over the nations" (Rev. 2 : 26) and they "shall reign on the earth" (5 : 10). In the eternal age they cannot have authority over the nations on the earth, for there will be no nations in the present sense of that term; and as for the earth itself, it will then have fled away, and "there was found no place for them" (Rev. 20 : 11).

But a further word of explanation is necessary to the effect that the reigning of Christ and his saints over the nations of the earth does not involve their possession of fleshly bodies like our present ones, nor their actual habitation on the soil of the earth. Christ's resurrection body is an indication of what the resurrection bodies of the saints may be. He could pass in and out of closed doors. He could be present and could vanish in an instant. He could ascend up into heaven, or remain upon the earth at his will; and the same is likely to be true of the saints, as we gather from 1 Cor. 15 : 42-49.

And as to a habitation on the soil of the earth: Does not King George reign over India with his throne in England, and does not President Wilson exercise authority over the Philippines from a capital at Washington? Why then should there be difficulty about the saints exercising dominion on the earth from their location in the air with Christ? The air, it should be remembered, is one of the "heavenly places" (Eph. 1 : 3; 2 : 6; 3 : 10; 6 : 12), and there are we to be "forever with the Lord" (I Thess. 4 : 17). It is from that vantage ground that the present God of this world exercises his power over the nations of the earth (Eph. 2 : 2); and what is to hinder the saints of God doing the same, when they with Christ shall occupy that domain from which he shall have been cast out (Rev. 12 : 7-12)?

TO sum up, the millennium is a thousand years of peace and righteousness, of prosperity and plenty, to be realized upon this earth. It will follow the second coming of Christ, at which time the church, which is his body (Eph. 1 : 22, 23; Col. 3 : 1-4), shall have been caught up to meet him in the air (I Thess 4 : 16-18). But though the saints will thus have been translated, they will not be deprived of a share in that blessing and its glory, for they shall reign with Christ on the earth, having authority over the nations.

This blessing not only follows but is consequent upon the second coming of Christ, and for the reason outlined above, that he will then bind Satan and cast him into the bottomless pit, that he should deceive the nations no more until the thousand years are ended.

The binding of Satan is associated with the divine judgments that shall fall upon the disobedient nations, and the subjection of those nations to the rule of Christ. The earth then shall be governed righteously; Israel shall be converted; idolatry shall cease; all false religions and false worships shall be put away, and, the material and animal creation sharing in the benefaction, the waste places shall "break forth into joy," and "all the ends of the earth shall see the salvation of our God" (Isa. 52 : 10).

But one thing more. When we speak of Christ subduing his enemies by power, and of the Millennium being introduced by his coming and his judgments, we must not forget the name and the work of the Holy Spirit. As we are reminded by another, so far as the conversion of souls is concerned in the millennial age, or any other age, the Holy Spirit is the agent by which it is accomplished.

As soon as the Antichrist arises in power, and even before Jesus comes in judgment on him and the nations under his leadership, the Holy Spirit is promised to a faithful remnant in Israel. "When the enemy shall come in like a flood, the Spirit of the Lord shall lift up a standard against him. And the RIGID RULES FOR ALIENS. As a result of various fires on docks and in factories working on government contracts, President Wilson on November 19 issued a proclamation establishing rigid rules for the conduct of enemy aliens in the United States. The President's proclamation forbids subjects of nations with which the United States is at war to approach or be found within 100 yards of any canal or any wharf, pier or dock used directly or indirectly by any vessel of over 500 tons gross burden, or within the same distance of any warehouse, shed, elevator, railroad or other terminal operated in connection with any pier or dock. Enemy aliens are also forbidden to be within three miles of the shore line of the United States or any of its territorial possessions, except that they are permitted to use public ferries. They are absolutely prohibited to enter or to be found within the District of Columbia or the Panama Canal zone. All such persons are required to register under rules to be fixed by the Attorney-General, and they are prohibited from changing their place of abode or occupation or from traveling without complying with such regulations as the Attorney-General may make and declare. All enemy aliens are required to report at such times and places as the regulations may require. The proclamation was put into immediate effect, and in the terminals around New York policemen and soldiers under arms searched all resorts and boarding-houses and other places where enemy aliens might be found, arresting 200 Germans in one raid in Hoboken. Some enemy aliens were found among the crews of ocean-going vessels, and a great many were found in boarding-houses within the 100-yard limit, and in some cases the execution of the President's order operated to effect hardship; but no exceptions were made to the rule, even when it affected experts in the government's employ in Washington. In the roundup a number of interesting prisoners were taken, including one soldier in uniform. In further pursuance of the same object it was announced on November 20 that the government, acting through the Bureau of Militia Affairs of the War Department, would organize a force of at least 100,000 men to guard essential property and to enforce the President's proclamation. Attorney-General Gregory on November 20 declared that ninety-five per cent. of the men in the country today would die as willingly for their beliefs as the men of 1776. Of the other five per cent. he said: "Our message will be delivered to them through the criminal courts all over the land, and may God have mercy on them, for they need expect none from an outraged people and an avenging government." It was announced on November 21 that Federal employment agencies were open to all enemy aliens forced out of work by the proclamation.

COUGH SPOILS AMBUSH. The activities of the Americans in the trenches since the encounters reported last week have been largely confined to patrol fighting. Dispatches of November 20 told of a well-prepared ambush of which the Germans learned, just in time to escape it, through a cough which one of the American soldiers was unable to restrain, many of the men having caught hard colds during the rainy spell in the trenches. It was announced, however, that on that date the rain had ceased for several days and the trenches were dry again. The Americans were devoting all their efforts, according to the correspondent, to "changing Germans into casualties." Active counter-battery work was continued, one American gun being put out of action by a German shell, while a German shrapnel, bursting over soldiers at supper by the roadside, killed one and wounded three. American batteries have frequently silenced German fire. It was announced on November 22 that the first American shot of the war in France was fired by Battery C of the Sixth Artillery. The Navy Department announced on November 20 that the American destroyer Chauncey, 220 tons, had been lost in collision while on patrol duty in foreign waters, and that twenty-one lives had been lost, three being officers. Colonel House and the other members of the American Mission reached Paris on November 22. While in London, they held a series of important conferences with British officers.

NO SUPPLIES FOR BOLSHEVIKI. It was announced on November 20 that the United States government would not permit further shipments of supplies from the United States to Russia until the situation in that country clears. Credits to the provisional Russian government had been granted to the amount of $325,000,000, of which $191,000,000 had been advanced.

Our New Serial

NEXT week the Christian Herald Family will make the acquaintance of Howard Chase, the manly man whose story has been told by Pastor Charles M. Sheldon.

Jerusalem, the Holy City, the goal of the Crusades, seems destined to return again to the true worship of Jehovah. The military campaign which seems now about to bring Jerusalem into British hands and through them into the hands of Christendom, will be fully outlined and explained in both its technical and political bearings by Anthony Arnoux next week.

Pastor Junius B. Remensnyder portrays in next week's sermon, vividly, and with his usual mastery, the problem of Protestant Unity.

RESTRICTING NON-ESSENTIALS. The Railroads War Board, the Priority Board and the Fuel Administrator, working together, have arranged a list of 525 non-essential commodities which might be subject to a more or less strict embargo in aid of the transportation problem. Eleven commodities are named as being at the head of the list, these being: Pleasure vehicles, candy, toys, table glassware, pottery, athletic goods, jewelry, silverware, window glass, electric signs and electric sign lighting. The production of these commodities may be restricted either through the curtailment of their allowance of fuel or by passing embargoes on their shipment.

LENINE ATTEMPTS TO FORCE PEACE. L. Trotzky, acting as Foreign Minister of the Bolsheviki cabinet in Petrograd, sent to the ambassadors of all the foreign governments in Petrograd on November 22, a formal note advising them of the formation of the Lenine government on October 26, and calling their attention to the offer of an armistice and of a democratic peace on the basis of no annexations and no indemnities and the self-determination of nations approved by the All-Russian Congress of Soldiers' and Workmen's delegates. He begged them to regard the above document as a formal offer of an immediate armistice on all fronts and the immediate opening of peace negotiations. The American ambassador transmitted the communication to Washington. Lenine is quoted as having declared that his government was not seeking a separate peace, but was only seeking to arouse all the peoples of the belligerent countries in order that popular power might put an end to bloodshed. Lenine's cabinet on November 25, had not been recognized as a valid government either by the Allies or by the Central Powers.

FIRST SHIP LAUNCHED. The first vessel constructed under the authority of the United States Shipping Board was launched on Saturday, November 24, at a Pacific coast shipyard. The vessel was named the Adlon, and is an oil-burner of 8,800 tons, standardized type. She was built in five months at a cost of a little over $1,500,000. The government, it was announced on November 21, would bend all its energies toward the production of ships and the transportation of men to France. The mark on November 23 was set at 6,703,300 tons by 1919, made up of 58 composite ships, 345 steel ships and 778 wooden ships, in addition to 2,500,000 tons under construction.

LABOR'S CONVENTION. The convention of the American Federation of Labor, meeting at Buffalo, upheld President Gompers by a vote of 450 to 15, in his loyal work for the government, in which he has placed the needs of the nation above all other considerations and questions involving the workingmen's part in the vigorous prosecution of the war against Germany. Representatives of the garment workers of New York refused to go on record at the roll call. The convention as a whole was a personal triumph for Mr. Gompers, and all of his activities were supported by the convention, which pledged its aid to the nation until the war was won. The committee on resolutions reported a resolution deploring that part of the Espionage Law which "threatened unduly the restrictions of a free press." And a resolution which was passed after a fight attacked Postmaster General Burleson for his "autocratic policy toward postal employees." The convention listened to addresses from A. C. Townley, president of the Farmers' Non-Partisan League, and L. B. Strayer, vice-president of the National Farmers' Congress, who pleaded for closer co-operation between the farmers and producers on the one side and labor and consumers on the other. The convention also passed a strong resolution against government by injunction.

BRITAIN WOULD DECORATE AMERICANS. The British ambassador to the United States communicated to the State Department on November 23 advice that the British Admiralty desired to recommend British decorations for certain officers and men on two United States destroyers for their services against enemy submarines. Secretary of the Navy Daniels was forced to reply that the acceptance of these decorations was forbidden by American law.

RAILWAYS UNITE FOR SERVICE. On November 23 a group of leading railroad executives proposed a radical rearrangement of all railway traffic in order to clear the road for the carrying of the tremendous volume of war freight. The propositions made are as follows: Abandonment of competing passenger service, the use of some railroads for freight only and others for coal only, shipment of food to Europe from Gulf ports to relieve congestion at Atlantic terminals, more manufacturing of munitions away from Eastern territories, common use of terminals, and a general pooling of equipment.

CHOLERA CAUSED MAUDE'S DEATH. General Frederick Stanley Maude, commander of the British forces in Mesopotamia, who died on November 18, after a brief illness, succumbed to cholera, according to the Saturday Review.

FRAGMENTS OF NEWS. The final report of the great Y. M. C. A. campaign for a $35,000,000 fund to cover the war work of the Association showed that a total fund of $50,153,054 had been raised. . . . Fuel Administrator Garfield announced on November 19 that the danger of serious labor disturbances in any of the bituminous coal districts had been ended by an iron-clad agreement between the miners and operators. . . . President Wilson on November 17 appointed Daniel Willard, president of the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad, chairman of the recently created War Industries Board. . . . The railways made their final argument on November 19 before the Interstate Commerce Commission on their appeal for a fifteen per cent. increase in rates. The Council stated that even this increase would be inadequate, and that an additional fifteen or twenty per cent. increase would soon be asked for. . . . It was announced on November 20 that negotiations were still on with Japan for the purchase by this government of Japanese vessels. It was pointed out that Japan had approximately 1,300,000 tons in foreign trade, of which it was proposed to transfer some 300,000 or 400,000 tons to the United States. The steel plates to be given in exchange for the ships would enable Japanese shipyards to complete some 500,000 tons, seventy-five per cent. completed at the present time. . . . More than fifty members of the I. W. W. were arrested in the oil fields of Kansas on November 20. . . . It is announced that the postponement for five years of Boxer indemnity payments will relieve the Chinese Government of the necessity of floating a foreign loan.

No Railroad Strike. It was announced on November 20 that all danger of a railway strike had been avoided on the preceding day by the action of the railroad managers in placing their interests entirely in the hands of the President. The men had already agreed to abide by the President's decision. Following a conference at the White House on November 22 between the President and the heads of the Railway brotherhoods, both the chief executive and the railway men announced that whatever the outcome of the appeal of the men to the roads for necessary increases in wages, the unions would call no strike, but would leave their case in the hands of the President.

The Vote for British Women. The House of Commons on November 20 unanimously decided to extend the parliamentary franchise to women on the same terms as they now have the municipal franchise. On the following day the House voted 209 to 171 to exclude conscientious objectors from the franchise.

Hoover Warns Householders. Herbert C. Hoover announced on November 19 that the Food Administration would not collect or commandeer foodstuffs from the homes of the country, and that all persons going from house to house claiming to be authorized by the Food Administration or other government departments to collect foodstuffs for the government or for the army were crooks, thieves or confidence operators. It is also stated on the authority of the Food Administration that there is no shortage of salt, and that the rumors which have resulted in hysterical buying and temporary shortages in various parts of the country, were started by persons interested in embarrassing the government.

Churches Can Help Save Coal. Many churches could help the fuel situation by using wood for heating. The Department of Agriculture advocates the substitution of wood from the farm wood lot for coal where practicable.

The same arguments hold for rural schools, for halls used for lodge and grange meetings and the like. In many instances, these are heated by coal because it has become the custom, though wood might be more economical. The amount saved by any one institution might not amount to much, but in the aggregate the possible saving is considerable. Arkansas has urged farmers to utilize timber cut in clearing farms. Similar action is being taken in North Carolina and other states.

China's Appalling Flood

A street in the Japanese concession in Tientsin at the beginning of the flood which completely covered this part of the city

MR. PHILIP RITTER, a well-known business man of New York City, has sent to the Christian Herald a copy of the following letter received from his son Richard, now in China, in which the latter gives a vivid description of the disastrous flood in Tientsin, which has caused great loss of life and widespread general distress:

"The all-absorbing topic of conversation around these parts at this time is the flood in Tientsin. There is very little news getting out, and a great many rumors. This much is certain, however: thousands of lives have been lost, a million are in danger from famine as well as from drowning, and many more are homeless.

"It is one of the most serious calamities that have ever fallen on China, and, unfortunately, it is not temporary. The cause of the flood is that the Yellow River has changed its course and is now flowing through where Tientsin was. It has adopted the Grand Canal as its new bed for a distance, then has switched off, not many miles south of Peking, into the channel which it formerly occupied many years ago, and on which Tientsin has been built, so that Tientsin, as a city, is probably done for forever. It is just as if the Hudson should suddenly change its course and spread through the middle of Brooklyn. It is worse than that, for, though Tientsin is probably as large as Brooklyn, in addition to Tientsin itself there are 20,000 square miles of open country under from two to twelve feet of water.

"Just think what that means—a district of 200 miles long and 100 miles broad, or its equivalent. And in that immense district hardly a house left standing, for these Chinese country houses are almost all of mud, and even the brick ones (having mud for mortar) often collapse in a heavy rain. All these houses are gone, the people homeless or dead, families separated, starving; and no really efficient aid-organization working. The Y. M. C. A., missions, churches and governments (national, provincial, and municipal) have combined to form a relief organization, but nothing much has been done yet, except to provide work for 20,000 men making holes in the dikes of the Grand Canal, which will relieve Tientsin somewhat, but jeopardize thousands more square miles of farm-land.

"The American Board Mission, I heard this morning, is in eight feet of water, and five or six mission schools have closed. We had one refugee, a teacher in one of these schools, for lunch today. She is going back to America, for she thinks her school is definitely and permanently disbanded, and she thinks she can help the sufferers more by going to America to raise funds than by staying here. If you could collect some money from your missionary society, it would do a lot of good.

"The misery in Tientsin must be terrible, and now, with winter coming on, it will be a veritable hell. These coolies can't buy new houses whenever they want to. Enough of them freeze to death every winter as it is, even when they have living quarters, and now it will be unbelievably horrible.

"Our Y. M. C. A. is going to send a committee down this week to see what can be done from the Peking end of the line, and I expect to go with it. So next week I'll probably have some first-hand experiences to tell, and I hope I'll be able to report some progress in the relief work. At present things seem almost hopeless. The Rockefeller Institute will help out in disease-preventing and medical relief, but there is room for almost any contribution, personal or financial, no matter how small it may be."

The Day of Great and Little Things

EVERY thoughtful mind which takes due cognizance of the momentous events that are convulsing the world must be impressed with the fact that we are living in the day of great things.

It is not only that the biggest battles of all time are being fought by the mightiest armies ever known, but the issues at stake are the greatest and most far-reaching, as they affect the liberty and future happiness of the entire human race.

Nor is it the day of great things simply because the national spirit of the peoples has everywhere been aroused. The spirit of sacrifice has been awakened to a point that never could have been reached in times past—that spirit which impels men and women in all ranks and conditions of life to dedicate and lay on the altar their dearest possessions and their lives, that the future welfare and security of the world may be assured and that wars may cease. The highest ideal is that which views the present conflict as a war against war, and one which is to bring world-peace to realization.

It is a day of great things and also of little things, for in the abundance of the smaller the larger are comprised. Fifty millions of dollars are raised in an overwhelming outburst of generosity for a worthy object for which hardly as many thousands could have been hoped for only a few years ago. But the thing that makes the larger gift really great is that it comes from tens of thousands, while former offerings represented only a few individuals. The multitude that gives makes the gift itself incomparably greater.

In this day of great ideals, great leaders, and great sacrifices there is still room for the doing of the little things that go to make up the sum total of a nation's greatness. No matter how humble our state, we can be faithful in simple service, loyal in all that relates to the advancement of our national ideals, generous as our slender means permit, and true to the faith of Him who gave all for the salvation and betterment of humanity, and who left as his legacy to his followers everywhere the divine example of self-sacrifice. His words shine like stars across the darkened heavens today: "Whosoever would save his life shall lose it, and whosoever shall lose his life for my sake shall find it." This is the greatest ideal the world has ever known or ever will know.

Don't Forget! All Read It!

WHEN Pastor Sheldon, who is now in Europe—and possibly by this time with our soldier boys "somewhere in France"—finished the last revision of his new serial story "Howard Chase," and forwarded it by arrangement to the Christian Herald for publication, he wrote us that, in accordance with a custom he had followed for many years with all of his stories, he had read it on successive evenings to his congregation, who gave it a most enthusiastic welcome. That it is the kind of story that will grip an audience mightily, we feel assured, having read it ourselves in the author's manuscript. The characters are drawn from life, and are not mere automata that stalk through the chapters, but living, breathing men and women of the varied types that one meets in a moderate-sized American country town. It is a moving picture of actual life in just such a community as most of us are familiar with. We follow the fortunes, good or bad, of the families and individuals he introduces; we share their pleasures, wonder at their slips and follies, and take a lively interest in the little drama that is presented in a way that makes us feel somehow that we ourselves are participants.

We hope that "Howard Chase" will be read, not only by every member of the great Christian Herald Family Circle, but by all the friends and acquaintances whom they can influence to join our Circle. This is the opportunity to get your neighbors to subscribe NOW, for the new Serial begins in next week's issue, December 12.

A New World After the War

IN writing of Dr. Jowett's pastorate, we lately expressed the thought that he is one of those preachers whose ministry is not confined by geographical bounds, but is international, like that of Henry Ward Beecher and Joseph Parker. His wide cognizance of spiritual needs and conditions at the present time is well illustrated in a message contained in a letter which he wrote to the congregation of Westminster Abbey in London, in which this notable passage occurs:

"When the war is over, in what direction is our life to move? Old things will have passed away; all things will have become new. But what sort of newness is it to be? Is it to be a new heaven and a new earth, and are the peoples to find a new inheritance and have a new song in their mouths? That will largely depend upon the passionate and sacrificial fidelity of the Christian Church. We have no need of a new Saviour; Jesus Christ is the very fulness of the eternal God, and we are complete in him. Nor is there any need of a new gospel. The old Gospel is all-sufficient, if it be vitally believed and convincingly lived by a church which recognizes no other leader than her Lord. We may have to make some new emphases and unfold as never before Christ's conception of the Kingdom of God, and declare his purpose to establish that Kingdom upon the earth. And certainly we shall have to be heralds with more fervent accents and with a passion which divides its strength with nothing else. But more than ever do I believe that, in the revelation of the holy grace and love of God in Jesus Christ our Lord, we have the vision and the dynamic of a new world, in which old jealousies and old strifes and old meannesses and old wrongs will be transformed into a racial fellowship, wherein Christ is all in all."

We could wish that this splendid and timely utterance might sound forth from every pulpit in America. It is a message for the Christians, not of London nor of New York, but of the whole world—a message full of truth and courage, of devotion and solemn warning. The Church needs just such a message today to arouse it to renewed confidence, and to give it strength to go forward, redeeming the past by what Dr. Jowett has finely described as "the passionate and sacrificial fidelity" of the future.

Put Your Soul in Your Work

IN the death of Auguste Rodin, the famous sculptor, not only the world of art but the thinking portion of the entire human family loses a member who made his genius a means of cultivating thought in its noblest forms. Rodin in his work has illustrated the power of art in awakening religious thought to a greater extent than any other artist of his day.

A capable critic has summarized his efforts in this respect by enumerating five of his productions: "Adam," "Eve," "The Bronze Age," "The Thinker," and "John the Baptist." Each of these marvelous masterpieces possesses the power of conveying to the mind of the observer the inmost thought, the very spirit of the worker who evolved them. One sees in "Adam" the reflection of a mighty problem dawning upon a new-found intelligence. "The Baptist" is an embodiment of spiritual exaltation, and is almost the living expression of a burning zeal to give a great message to men. "The Thinker" is a being who, absorbed in reflection, seems to be pondering the great problem of the whence and wherefore of human existence. "The Bronze Age" man seems to interrogate the skies concerning his duty and his destiny. In these sculptures and many more, Rodin put not only his skill as a craftsman, but his very self, his vitality and the force that makes the whole production creative. He had a mission to awaken the higher and deeper thoughts of men. He achieved greatness by the only means through which it can be reached; by putting his soul into his work.

And so it is in all kinds of human effort. We may labor painstakingly and apply every known device to attract, amuse, entertain and give pleasure; but unless we put our soul into our work, we miss the great reward, which is the permanent and abiding one, and which does not fade with the passing of the years.

The Coal Problem

ONE hundred million tons of coal more than is normally produced in the United States is needed this year for war purposes. The possible increase of production is 50,000,000 tons. The remaining gap of 50,000,000 tons can only be secured by the most unusual measures of conservation on the part of the American people. This is the situation, as explained by the United States Fuel Administration in Washington, and it is one which demands the consideration of every coal consumer in this nation. It is quite evident that only by the greatest frugality in the use of coal in homes and factories can we hope to prevent a serious shortage, which, if it should come, would almost certainly be a heavy embarrassment to business and would greatly limit production in many lines. In homes innumerable it would mean cold rooms in mid-winter, and possibly privation and sickness. With a strong effort at coal economy now, these dangers may be averted.

We would ask all the readers of the Christian Herald to cooperate with the effort to economize coal consumption. Every individual householder can help the government in this effort to solve a serious national problem which, if neglected, may mean a great deal of inconvenience and suffering later on.

Salaries for Wives

A CHICAGO club woman wants the Federated Women's Clubs to demand of the legislatures of all the states laws requiring husbands to pay their wives a salary.

Nine-tenths of the wives of the country are home women, declares the author of this proposition, and have no property rights whatsoever. The husband can dictate just how much she shall spend. If he wants to buy a pair of expensive trousers, he can do it without consulting her; but if she "wears the trousers" he reserves the right to regulate the cost.

Manifestly this is unfair. Without money of her own to spend as she pleases, and, above all, without independence from her husband's domination, a woman can never be a man among men in the woman's clubs. She can never go gadding about to conventions, resolving things and demanding the emancipation of women who don't want to be emancipated from that sweet dependence in love which is the sacredest part of a woman's nature. But she cannot clip her hair and split her skirts and stand before the world as an example that woman is equal to man in all things—not while she must go to her husband for permission to buy a pair of half-hose or a red necktie.

"Formerly," urges the author of this proposition, "husbands were held by beauty and sweet disposition. While those attributes were commendable, the husband today wants something more; he wants his wife to know who is mayor."

It would be interesting to have an estimate of the regular salary supposed to be required by a woman to enable her to know who is mayor. It would be even more interesting to know why the beauty and sweet disposition that once held a husband seem now to be deemed insufficient.

When women abandon love and their own natural graces as their instrument of power over their husbands, and resort to laws, they had better see to it that the laws are good and strong.

A Stray Yellow Dog

HE was a vagrant and marauder in the vicinity. Only a yellow dog that nobody owned.

You have seen the type—everybody has. Legitimate prey of the small boy, object of scorn of all adult humanity, ranking lower in the scale of life than the tuberculosis bacillus and the vermiform appendix, the stray yellow dog has always been in a class by himself, and always at the foot of his class.

This particular stray yellow dog was but a type of uncounted thousands. Every town knows him. Every boy shies stones at him and ties cans to his tail and sends him skally-hooting out of the neighborhood. It is at the expense of the stray yellow dog that the modern boy gives vent to the savage that is in him, and goes unreproved.

Well, the other day a boy coaxed this stray dog to him and patted his head to gain his confidence.

But only long enough to tie a tin can to his tail.

Now, this dog was familiar with cans, and quietly sat down, facing the boy with a look of sadness and reproach.

Then the boy kicked the dog and started him off. He threw some stones after him to set him going. But the dog when he had got beyond the reach of the stones sat down again and resumed his speechless reproaches. He liked that patting on the head. He longed for companionship and sympathy.

The boy went to play on a raft in a pond, and when he fell off the raft, as, of course, all bad little boys do, he came within a breath of drowning. No human help was near, and his plight was desperate. He was going down for the third time and vaguely grasping about him for the traditional straw, when his hands caught a mass of shaggy hair.

The last thing the boy remembered was his hanging on for dear life, and when his senses came back he was lying upon the bank and the stray yellow dog was licking his face and whimpering with joy.

A stray yellow dog with a tin can tied to his tail can sometimes teach the highly superior human being a lesson.

General Foster, Diplomatist, Dead

GENERAL JOHN W. FOSTER, Secretary of State in the cabinet of President Harrison, dean of American diplomats and father-in-law of Mr. Robert Lansing, the present Secretary of State, died at his home in Washington, November 15. He was graduated at the Indiana State University, attended law school at Harvard, practiced law at Evansville, Ind., entered the Civil War as major, and was breveted as brigadier general at its close. He was appointed by President Grant as minister to Mexico, and rendered similar service in Russia and Spain. He was one of the wisest and safest members of President Harrison's cabinet as Secretary of State, succeeding James G. Blaine in that position. General Foster represented the Chinese government in the treaty of peace after the war with Japan, and later at the second Hague Conference. He was sent on special missions to Russia and England by the United States, and was made a member of the Commission to settle the Alaskan boundary. For about fifty years Mr. Foster served his country ably and faithfully in one capacity or another. He fought for his country when he was young and then spent a long life in adjusting its relations to the rest of the world. His mental ability, coupled with a native modesty and splendid character, gave his public service a charm and authority which made his life a genuine factor in the best and highest destiny of the republic. General Foster's heart was as wide and deep as his intellect was strong. His home life was beautiful. He was a very religious man, a genuine Christian, devoted to every department of the work of the local church to which he belonged, and to the evangelical, missionary and benevolent work of the church at large throughout the world. The Presbyterian Church of America looked up to him with veneration, affection and gratitude as an ideal man and Christian. What was said of the ancient king can here be said of this aged public servant and saint: "And he died in a good old age, full of days, riches, and honor." (I Chron. 29 : 28.)

China Celebrates Republic's Foundation

CHINA'S Fourth of July is the 10th of October. On that date the founding of the Chinese Republic was celebrated with imposing ceremonies. A decorated pavilion was built for the reception of the president and his cabinet. They reviewed twenty-five thousand troops at Nan Yuan, the old imperial hunting-park twelve miles from Peking. The soldier-like appearance and equipment of the troops made a very favorable impression. After several thousand years of monarchy China began to wake up and see better things in store for it than the absolutism that had ruled it. Two things caused the awakening: first, influences from without, the thrift and power of the nations that had adopted the Western civilization. Second, influences within, the teachers and missionaries who brought not only a Gospel of salvation for the soul, but also political liberty for the common people. The imperial government promised a constitution and a parliament after a certain number of years, but the pressure of the times was so great that the emperor was compelled to abdicate, and the nation swung from the farthest extreme to a democracy, not heeding the constitution and parliament as the usual steps to it. At the beginning of 1912 Dr. Sun Yat Sen was chosen provisional president. Yuan Shi Kai was made the first permanent president. A reaction set in toward monarchy, and the president, mistaking the people, had the constitution changed, and became emperor. Then came a reaction toward democracy, and Yuan Shi Kai was told that he was going to be very sick and die, and he did, and China became a republic again. The people and rulers seem very happy in their celebration of the birth of democracy. We are living in the era of the common people. The king business is dead. It is the truth as it is in Jesus that is setting the world free. "If the Son therefore shall make you free, ye shall be free indeed." (John 8 : 36.)

Women Mail-Carriers

ABOUT a month ago Nellie McGrath and Permelia Campbell filed out of the main post office in Washington, D. C., with thirty-five pounds of letters and periodicals slung over their shoulders and started on their respective routes to deliver the mail, one taking the territory which included the large union railroad station, the other that of Little Italy. Men and women stopped to look at these female letter-carriers that Uncle Sam had set to doing the work usually done by the men; and the children followed them, some laughing, and enjoying the novel sight. Mrs. Campbell's husband was a postman and died about a year ago and she has taken his place to maintain a home for her two daughters and a son. She gets up at five in the morning, cooks breakfast, and leaves the house at six-thirty. She cooks a good hot dinner at night for the family. Mrs. McGrath's husband also was a letter-carrier, but is now with the District National Guard in Alabama, and she has been given his place. The department says that the scarcity of men makes the employment of the women proper and even necessary; that every woman doing a man's work in any department relieves a man for the front, and becomes herself a patriot. Some of the male letter-carriers at Washington do not look with favor upon the appointment of women to their task. They say an indoor job would be a much more agreeable and appropriate one. They say that the heavy loads to carry, the everlasting climbing of stairways, the going in all kinds of weather, in snow and rain and freezing cold, will be too hard for them, and that they will tire or break down under the strenuous task. But woman has a surprising power of endurance, and in the support of a family or in any patriotic service she will perform well any task to which duty may call her. It is time the United States government were providing pensions for the splendid, self-sacrificing, often heroic letter-carriers and post office employees. There is this mention of an official letter-carrier in Bible times: "So the posts went with the letters from the king and his princes throughout all Israel and Judah." (II Chron. 30 : 6.)

Dog Solving Murder Mystery

THE intelligence of a police dog may solve the mystery of the murdered man whose headless body was found the other day in a lot at Paterson, N. J. After Paterson and the surrounding country had been searched three days for the missing head, John Kinney, a reserve policeman, took his specially trained Belgian hound to the place where the body was found, and the animal was permitted to get the scent of the garments found with the body. He at once started off at high speed, went a circuitous route, and did not stop until he had reached a tree on the bank of the Passaic River a quarter of a mile from where he started. There was nothing in the tree, and excavations at the base revealed nothing. The dog repeated his pursuit of the trail three times but nothing was found. A day or so afterward Policeman Kinney put his dog on the scent again, and again he went to the tree. Then A. C. Evans, master mechanic in a dye-house near, put on high rubber boots and waded out into the muck of the river at that point. He soon found the missing head, which had sunk about eight inches into the mire. This finding will aid in the solution of the murder mystery. How keen and true is the scent of a well-trained dog! The hunter knows that the birds are near because his trusted dog has become motionless with tail rigid and says as plainly as though he spoke human language, "The birds are here. Get ready and I will start them up." The murder mystery in Paterson reveals man at his worst and the dog at his best; a man killed by his fellow; a dog enlisting all his powers in the interest of law, order, justice, in the detection and punishment of the criminal. The dogs of Bible lands must have been a different breed from ours or the writers would have had something good to say in their favor. They were counted the symbol of everything that is mean. The thought is thus expressed: "And Hazael said, But what, is thy servant a dog, that he should do this great thing?" (II Kings 8 : 13.)

Johnsons Outnumber Smiths

IN the Chicago directory just published the Smiths are outnumbered by the Johnsons. There are the names of 9,600 Johnsons and only 7,240 of the Smiths. The Browns come next with 4,280, and the Joneses fourth with 3,690. The directory indicates a population of 2,652,900, a gain of 40,000 over last year. The Scandinavians of the Northwest have poured into Chicago in such numbers that it is likely on that account that their name Johnson has outnumbered the rest. In the directories of most cities the Smiths are the most numerous. Smith, one of the oldest and most wide-spread family names of England, is originally from the honorable occupation of a smith or worker in wood or metal. The Johnsons go to the Bible for their family name, "There was a man sent from God, whose name was John." (John 1 : 6.)

Y. M. C. A. Fund $49,209,411

THE Young Men's Christian Association started out to raise a fund of $35,000,000 for Association work among the soldiers and sailors. At the close of the drive, November 19, they had about fifteen million dollars more than was asked. President Wilson wired to Dr. John R. Mott, having the campaign in charge, "My heartfelt congratulations on the remarkable and gratifying results. I think it is a national blessing." The war has prompted some of the most colossal benevolences the world has known, among them $100,000,000 for the Red Cross, and now $50,000,000 for the Y. M. C. A. What a superb expression of the vigor of Christian young manhood, thus referred to: "I have written unto you, young men, because ye are strong, and the Word of God abideth in you." (I John 2 : 14.)

“HE SHALL REIGN”

A SERMON

By
*REV. J. H. JOWETT, D.D.

TEXT—Rev. 11:25, R. V. “The kingdom of the world is become the kingdom of our Lord, and of his Christ: and He shall reign for ever and ever.”

IN the Authorized Version we have “The kingdoms of this world.” In the Revised Version it is given “The kingdom of the world.” Christianity does not seek the destruction of the kingdoms of the world. It does not seek to merge a rich and manifold variety into a dull and unattractive monotony. The nationalities are to be preserved. Differences in political constitution will persist. Many forms of organization will remain, many modes of expression, many varieties of external shrines. The kingdoms will be kingdoms still, even when Christianity is triumphant. But “the kingdom of the world,” that subtle sovereignty whose decree runs through each and all the kingdoms, will be inherently transformed, becoming even “the kingdom of our Lord.”

And what is “the kingdom of the world”? It is the devil-dominion in every kingdom, the carnal dominion, the lust dominion, the self dominion, the dominion of dark superstition and of cold and cruel pride. This kingdom shall become the subject of a great and startling change, and by the alchemy of grace shall be transmuted into “the Kingdom of our Lord and of his Christ.”

“He shall reign for ever and ever.” Our familiarity with the music of the Hallelujah Chorus has led us to place the emphasis on the pronoun, but the Scripture places the emphasis on the verb. “He shall reign for ever and ever,” sings the Hallelujah Chorus! “He shall reign,” proclaims the Word of God! “He shall reign!” He shall not be a mock sovereign, to whom we offer ceremony but deny the scepter; a sovereign by courtesy, but not by sway; a sovereign who receives recognition on our coins, but not on our hearts; who is followed by our nods and becks and smiles, but not honored by the homage of our arms. No, he shall not be a counterfeit king, a toy king, swathed in impotent purple; he shall be a real King, and he shall reign! “The kingdom of the world shall become the Kingdom of our Lord, . . . and he shall reign for ever and ever.” He shall be King indeed.

AND what are the characteristics of the Kingdom of our Lord? There is a Pauline answer sufficiently definite and descriptive. “The Kingdom of God . . . is righteousness, and peace, and joy in the Holy Ghost.” We must not sever this sentence, cutting one part from another, or we shall injure a main artery, and the thing will bleed to death. The Kingdom of God is, first of all, “righteousness . . . in the Holy Ghost.” And what is righteousness? It is twofold. It implies rightness with God, and consequent rightness with man. Two relationships are adjusted. In the deepest places of the life an awful perversion has been rectified; then in the rectification of that relationship man is also adjustive to his brother man.

In the second place, the Kingdom of God is “peace . . . in the Holy Ghost.” The peace is the fruit of the rightness; it is movement without friction; the dislocation is ended, and there is quiet liberty of movement in God. And in the third place, the Kingdom of God is “joy . . . in the Holy Ghost.” Life that has become rectified in its fundamental relationships, and is now moving without discord, and will certainly experience “the joy of the Lord.” The laws and statutes of the Almighty will become its songs, and its obedience will be a life of perfect freedom.

And now I can see the range of the proclamation of my text. “The kingdom of the world,” with all its egotism, its devilry, its lust, its pride, is to become “the Kingdom of our Lord,” with its fundamental righteousness, its pervading peace, and its enduring joy.

AND this is the Kingdom for which we pray when we say, “Thy Kingdom come.” Are there any signs of its coming? Before I wrote this sentence, I looked at the current copy of my daily paper. My eyes first fell upon the story of an awful outrage near my own city. Then I saw the larger part of a column devoted to describing the cruelties which still abound on the Congo. Still further space was given to the analysis of European navies and armaments, and of the present proposals to augment them. And I laid the paper down, and returned to my text asking the question, Where are the signs of His coming?

And yet, all the signs are not wintry and depressing. I turn to the calendar, which tells me Nature’s movements, and I find these entries: “Skylark sings until November.” “Yew tree begins to flower”; “Crocus appears”; and all these emerge even amid the prevalent cold and desolation.

And so it is in the moral world. If I look closely, there is more than tragedy and disaster, more than moral lapse and degradation. There are signs of a quickening presence which clearly suggests that the Kingdom of the spiritual spring is coming. Look at the glorious ferment of our time! It is surely due to some hidden yeast which has been implanted in the affairs of men by the Divine hand. Look at the growing dissatisfaction with the unsatisfactory. Look at the uneasiness which is more and more troubling the easeful. Look at the awaking conscience of the world in every people and in every land. Everywhere the peoples are stretching themselves, as a sleeper emerging from a deep sleep. The peoples may be a little uncertain both in sight and movement, but they are opening their eyes, and they are staggering to their feet, and they will soon be able to stand! Yes, I welcome the ferment; I welcome the unrest. It is as the troubling of the waters by the angel at the pool, and its very disturbance is fraught with gracious healing.

But even though there were no signs of the spiritual spring, nothing but grim, hard, black winter, nothing but the reign of devilry and pride, it would still be ours to call to the peoples, to confess the glories of our sovereign Lord, to proclaim his rightful sovereignty, to herald the beneficence of his sway, and humbly and unceasingly to pray, “Thy Kingdom come.”

NOW, the Kingdom of our Lord is founded upon the love and grace of our Lord. If, therefore, we would promote the Kingdom we must proclaim the love; if we would establish the sovereignty we must sound his grace abroad. In the Christian evangel there are, at any rate, three things. First, there is revelation, a drawing back of the curtain, and the unveiling of the Father in Jesus Christ our Lord. Secondly, there is aspiration; moral ideals and possibilities are presented to us like sunlit Alpine heights. And, third, there is inspiration; we have the word of reconciliation in Jesus Christ, and in him also we have the gift of eternal life.

Now we have got to tell this good news, to announce this evangel, even though the whole world were frozen in unresponsiveness, and no one believed our report. The Church of Christ has no option. She has received her marching orders. She is to “think imperially” in the grandest sense, and to “go into all the world and preach the Gospel to every creature.”

But before the Church can truly and fruitfully think imperially, she must of necessity live holily. Her imperial thought depends for its virtue upon her personal life. Her thought-stuff gathers its strength from her life-stuff. There will be nerveless thought where there is nerveless life. The ministry of the foreign field has its efficacy determined by the character of the Church at home.

IF we are to be instrumental in transforming the kingdom of the world into the Kingdom of the Lord, he must first of all be “our Lord.” Is he that? It is no good our going any farther unless we can humbly address him by this most sacred and personal name. Unless we are Christian saints, we shall never be Christian imperialists. If there is homage at the center, there will be wonderful happenings at the circumference. Foreign missions are quite secure if only we have a home Church sincere and sanctified.

Well, what think you of the Church at home? Does she constitute a hopeful starting-point of Christian imperialism? Think of her quarrelsomeness. We are far more intent upon controversy than we are upon service. The churches put more energy into canvassing at an election than into canvassing for souls. We become more interested in a fierce personal combat than we do in an evangelical crusade. And then think of her quarrelsomeness! How petty many Christian people are, and how “touchy,” and how easily they throw up their sacred commissions! A man is subject to what he calls offense, and he immediately sends in his resignation. The whole thing is regarded as a relationship between man and man, and the Lord does not count!

How can we say he is “our Lord” when these ugly things exist in our midst? And how can we be intent upon the spread of his Kingdom when we give him no honor as our King? Before we can be ardent apostles it is needful that we be lowly disciples, flinging ourselves at the King’s feet with the cry, “My Lord and my God!”

Get this life at the center, and it will radiate with marvelous force. A friend said to me the other day that he had got a lens which would throw a picture the length of the street. And when the heart of the Church is clean and sincere, she will have a lens through which she can send a clear image of the Lord to the ends of the earth. When we are lit up, “Gentiles will come to our light.” “Nations that knew not thee shall run unto thee because of the Lord thy God.”

Lords of Circumstance

SUNDAY, December 9. Ps. 112 : 7. "He shall not be afraid of evil tidings: his heart is fixed, trusting in the Lord." Here is one whom we may call the lord of circumstance. He does not feel that the end is come when some threatening rumor assails his ears. He does not stumble at the approach of frowning events. He is not the victim of panic, he is not the bondslave of paralyzing fear. He is calm, self-possessed, quietly confident. What is the secret of his strength and assurance?

"His heart is fixed." That is the first part of the great secret. His heart is not a vagrant, seeking every night at some new door-step for lodging and shelter. His heart has lost the dissipating lust of wandering. It has settled down, and has resolved to put life to the proof in one supreme test. And that must be our secret too. There are some souls who are always on the road. They are vagrants. They have no settled habitation or abode. They spend a night with Theosophy, then a night with Christian Science, then a night with New Thought, then a night with Spiritualism, then a night with Jesus Christ, then—and so on, and so on! You never know their spiritual address. If we call at their last lodging we are told they have "gone and left no address." They go everywhere but get nowhere! But this man of the psalm had ceased his light flirtations with everything and everybody. His heart was fixed: he had settled down.

"Trusting in the Lord." That was the second and complementary part of his great secret. A God who could be trusted, and he would trust in Him! That was the home of his soul, the dwelling-place where his heart was stayed. God, the faithful God, supplied the major premise in all his reasonings. All his thinkings about everything began just here—in the holy, gracious, loving God. Whenever he wanted to form a judgment about anything he began with God. "I am Alpha." He acknowledged that great affirmation, and God became the alpha in all his thoughts. His confidence rested in God, there he made his rest.

And therefore he is not "afraid of evil tidings." In the hurricane of circumstances he hears the still small voice. In the threatening furnace he sees one like unto the Son of Man. This man's fight in life is not self versus circumstances. These are the combatants, —a man abiding in the Lord versus any unfriendly circumstance that may stride along his road! And he is not afraid! "This is the victory which overcometh the world, even our faith." J. H. J.

The Transient and the Eternal

MONDAY, December 10. Ps. 102 : 25-27. "The heavens are the work of thy hands. They shall perish, but thou shalt endure. . . . Thou art the same, and thy years shall have no end." On the Hudson some miles above New York there is a great house in the dining-room of which are carved in stone above the fireplace the figures of a group of sun-worshipers. Christians are grateful for the sun and its light and heat, but they do not worship the sun. They worship Him who made the sun. This is the sentiment of the psalmist, who has all a poet's love for nature, but who knows that nature is not changeless, but that the God of nature is. So we pray, "O thou that changest not." The sun changes. Science makes note of its varying phases. God is the same, yesterday, today and forever. Scripture affirms his immutability and human experience attests the psalmist's words, "Thou art the same." History is a graveyard of nations. The rise and fall of empires, the growth and decline of nations, the swift panorama of world politics, and the certainty that nothing material abides, give us a deep sense of insecurity.

A little child, riding in a carriage, fording a stream, grew dizzy and cried out to his father, who was driving, "The carriage is floating away." His father simply said, "Don't look at the water—look at the shore." When the child lifted his eyes from the swift flowing water to something permanent, his dizziness passed. It is good that amidst the ceaseless flux of things we may fix our mind on God. It steadies us, gives us the calmness and the strength to pursue our journey knowing that though all things else may perish, God endures. His word endureth forever. Christ is the King Immortal. C. C. The Ever-Enduring Word

TUESDAY, December 11. Rom. 15 : 4. "Whatsoever things were written aforetime were written for our learning, that we through patience and comfort of the Scriptures might have hope." The Bible contains matters that had a particular meaning at the time they were recorded; they served a special purpose, like the old Jewish ceremonial ordinances, the boundaries of the tribal lands which were laid off in the days of Joshua, etc. Some of the prophecies of the Old Testament refer to political conditions prevailing at the time. Yet all these things have been recorded with a scope that makes them important for all time.

It is the voice of the one true God that speaks from every page of the Bible; it is the same sinful race of men with whom he deals, now in righteousness and justice, now in mercy and love; it is the same plan of redemption which he pursues from Genesis to Revelation. This gives to the Bible a perennial freshness. Its contents have permanent value. Each age and generation of men spells out its lessons, pores over its mysteries, is cowed or lifted up by its messages. The old lessons have a meaning for every new situation that arises in the affairs of men.

The world will never outgrow the use of the Bible. This book is the one book that will never become obsolete. It is necessary, however, that men come to this book with a docile mind, otherwise they will not understand that things written thousands of years ago were written for them. The Bible was given for doctrine. If they are discouraged by the many limitations under which they must live and work, this book can teach them patience and guide them slowly but surely to success. If they are pining in grief and sorrow, and life is become a vast vale of misery to them, this book can open up inexhaustible wells of comfort for them. If life has become a great void to them, if they have given up all aspirations, buried all their fond wishes, this Book can kindle new hopes in them. For this Book speaks of Christ, who is made unto us wisdom, and righteousness, and sanctification, and redemption. W. H. T. D.

Living as Lights

WEDNESDAY, December 12. Rom. 14 : 7. "For none of us liveth to himself." Human laws hold us responsible for action, not for example. But God's law says, "No man liveth unto himself." We must shine as lights in the world; as the shadow follows the sun, so your silent influence follows your life—a shadow of blessing or of blackness.

The impress of eternity is stamped upon every moral condition, making it a coin of value, or a counterfeit. What kind of currency are you handing your friends who are in poverty of soul need? If your life is holy, it is impossible to compute your riches in the blessedness of your influence, in the diadem that will adorn your crown of rejoicing. Words, thoughts, actions, are the treasures of the heart. The immortality of influence is the glory of humanity, for we know that if the act lives, the actor must live also.

The fact that we know so little of the effect of words and deeds upon others becomes a delightful thought when the truth is revealed to the soul. How often, when feeling, in hours of discouragement, that your life has been a failure, you have been lifted up to the very heavens by the sudden revelation of some good you have unconsciously accomplished!

It is said that a manufacturer of perfumes had become so saturated with the fragrance that he carried the sweet odor wherever he went. Are there not those who cannot help the fragrance of their unselfish living? It is like incense rising to heaven and radiated on earth. It is in every letter you write, in every breath you breathe. It may be in the very hem of your garment as you go about your toil. People find virtue by coming in contact with you; sunshine in your shadow. E. W. C.

What Is Religion For?

THURSDAY, December 13. Matt. 9 : 35. "And Jesus went about all the cities and villages, teaching in their synagogues, and preaching the Gospel of the Kingdom, and healing every sickness and every disease among the people." When Jesus sent his disciples out he gave them a twofold commission: officially they were to preach and teach; personally they were to help and heal. His charge to his followers has never been annulled or amended. If the church were a legally incorporated body, the purpose of its existence could not be better stated than in the words he addressed to his disciples in Judea. A single sentence describes the work he began to do: "He preached the kingdom of God and healed the sick." To say that he preached and not to say that he healed would be a very incomplete statement. He preached and healed. The most of his miracles were medical or surgical. All but two of his miracles were wrought because somebody was in need. Surely it can not have escaped our notice that Jesus touched those he healed. He touched the eyes of the blind; he took children into his arms, put his hands upon them and blessed them; he touched lepers; he took the little damsel by the hand and bade her awake. When he did a benevolent deed he did it benevolently. He showed mercy cheerfully. He did it with consideration for the person so benefited. If Jesus had but a crust to give, he would say, "I have not much bread, but what I have is yours and mine together." One thus fed would always feel that such a man was akin to him.

The framework of Christianity is doctrine, but the creed is, after all, only a framework, a skeleton. Who would care to live in the skeleton of a house? What commercial firm would invite its customers into the skeleton of a business block? The life of Jesus brought down to date, the living and loving ministry of Christlike hands and hearts, the very embodiment of Jesus in practical goodness, the vital spirit of Jesus manifest in personal and social conduct—all these are required to "adorn the doctrine," to give it shape and beauty, and to commend it to the acceptance of the world. C. C. A.

Faith on Evidence

FRIDAY, December 14. Matt. 11 : 3. "Art thou he that should come, or do we look for another?" The faith of the earliest followers of Christ was not the blind faith of enthusiasts or bigots, but an intelligent assurance resting on satisfactory evidence. Christ himself would have none other for his followers than men who were honestly convinced that he was what he claimed to be—the promised Messiah, the Redeemer of mankind. He challenged investigation. Many a time he wrestled with the Jews who disputed his divine origin and his merciful mission. If they would not believe his words, they must at least believe his works. To the inquirers who came to him with the critical question in our text he at once submitted the evidence that convinced them and sent them back satisfied to their master John. On the day of his resurrection he spent hours with two doubters, showing them from the Scriptures of the Old Testament and the record of his life among them that their skepticism was unwarranted. A week later he saved Thomas from his fatal misgivings concerning Christ. After his ascension the apostles reasoned with Jews and Gentiles and showed that the crucified and risen Christ is the Light and the Life of the world, that there is salvation in none other, and that other foundation cannot be laid for men's faith than this very Christ.

Unbelief may be blind and unreasoning; faith is knowledge that rests on satisfactory evidence, assent that is given to convincing proof, assurance that is ready to undergo any test. With the evidence which the Christian Church has accumulated during two thousand years of activity among men and is able to lay before the world, it should not be easy for any person at this late day to ask the question in our text. But if there is still one who doubts, Jesus will listen to him today as he listened to Nicodemus, to Nathaniel, to Cleophas. His word in the Scriptures, the records of his work in the lives of men, carry the same conviction to men today as they did in the days of his flesh. W. H. T. D.

The Way, the Truth and the Life

SATURDAY, December 15. John 14 : 6. "I am the Way, the Truth and the Life." If there are souls today like Thomas, doubtful about whither Jesus went and the way they are going, Christ's reply ought to settle all such fears. "I am the Way, the Truth and the Life." Jesus intimated, "Though I shall be absent from you, I will be present in the Comforter. I will be the Way to the Father's house. Therefore, follow me, and you will never be troubled. I am the Way to God, for I am God. I am the Way home, for I am the Home. You need not seek a terminus, but the eternal Way, for we are going on together forever. There can be no other way, for I am the Truth and the Life."

What Jesus said and did in three short years are not only truth and life, but he is all the unexpressed, infinite truth and righteousness. All wisdom and knowledge find their source in the fastnesses of his Godhead. He is the Doctrine and the Life, Author and Lover; his lips speak what his life lives; his miracles witness to the truth; his love imparts the truth; his death meets the law of truth and justice. He is full of grace and truth; dwelling in him and he in us, we realize enough of the truth about the future life to satisfy the soul. Without Christ the curtain shuts down, the horizon is a little circle; with him it is limitless, evermore glorious. What is your life? Happy are you if you can answer, "For me to live is Christ; to die is more of him, to be going on with him forever." E. W. C.

Thoughtful Gifts

CHRISTMAS has always been the day of giving gifts ever since three wise men, traveling across a desert, brought gold and frankincense and myrrh to the feet of a new-born baby. They laid at the feet of this Babe their greatest treasures, and thus Christmas has always been a day of giving.

And yet, very often Christmas giving is not the right sort of giving. For a gift, to be a real gift, must be touched with the personality of the giver, must be agleam with friendliness and good cheer, and unselfishness; a gift, to be a real gift, must be lovingly and thoughtfully given.

"So many people send me presents on Christmas," I heard a girl say a few days ago, "that I have an awfully hard time. It's just buy, buy, buy to keep up with them, and there's always a dash at the last minute for gifts to pay back the people that I didn't expect presents from!"

That girl, I am sure, never saw the vision of a stable—a lonely stable with the Gift of God sleeping, sweetly, in a manger.

One Christmas a rich woman sent me a wonderful blouse. It was made of chiffon and fine lace and embroidered ribbon and there was a touch of fur on it. It was quite the most beautiful blouse that I had ever owned. I went directly to the rich woman's home to thank her for it.

"The blouse was very lovely, indeed!" I told her.

"Was it?" she acknowledged languidly, "I'm so glad that you liked it. I never really saw it, though, for my secretary picked it out."

That same year a man who was far away on an absorbing business trip wrote me a Christmas letter. It was just a little note, scribbled on heavy gray paper, but it brought with it a message of Yuletide cheer, and the brightness of holly berries, and the gleam of good fellowship. And somehow I found myself appreciating that letter, with its personal touch, more than I appreciated the gorgeous gift of the rich woman—the gift that she had never seen, the gift that she left to the shopping skill of her secretary.

This year, Christmas will be a particularly thoughtful day. Gifts will—must—be small and inexpensive and many of them will be sent across the sea. This year the joy of the season will be tempered with sadness. And yet it will still be Christmas—the season of giving.

And so, as you give, remember to give lovingly instead of as a matter of duty. And let your giving be the sort of giving that does not tire shop-girls and exasperate shop managers. And let your gifts, simple though they be, contain a something of you—a subtle warmth!

For on the first Christmas day three wise men rode across the desert sands to bring the first Christmas gifts. And we—following in their path—the path that leads back across the centuries—must not lose sight of the manger, their destination nor of the Christ, their King!

AN AMERICAN HOUSEWIFE

MRS. FRANCIS BOWES SAYRE—who was Jessie Wilson, our president's middle daughter—is the finest type of American wife and mother. Leaving the White House at the time of her marriage she dropped very quietly and sweetly out of the limelight and made a home for her husband just as any other girl would have done it.

Christmas is the time for Madonna pictures—and the photograph of Mrs. Sayre, with her two babies, might well be called a modern Madonna!

The Gifts That I Liked Best

SOME friends of mine have written me letters—letters that tell of home-made Christmas gifts that they have found pleasure in. Perhaps, when you are making your Christmas presents, you will find that their suggestions are worth while.

"I want to tell," writes C. D., "about a Christmas gift I received and which I am copying. It is the dearest little traveling manicure case made out of ribbon and nicely fitted.

"A piece of ribbon eighteen inches long forms the foundation. This is folded in half and a piece of cotton batting is laid in between to give it strength. French knots in even rows about an inch apart keep this in place. The end of the ribbon is brought to a point, and a snap fastener is placed there to keep the case closed when rolled up. The width of the ribbon is five inches.

"Next a piece of ribbon three inches wide and five and a half inches long is sewed to the straight end of the case, forming a pocket for soap paper. Five inches of inch-wide ribbon was used to make little loops through which to slip the manicure scissors, a small nail file, orange stick, a piece of nail polish in a small ivory case, and such other articles as you might wish to include. The ribbon was fastened at each end and sewed at intervals of about an inch.

"This was easily made and cost very little—but it is a very handy little case which can be used whether traveling or at home."

"As Christmas draws near," says L. E. K., "I thought I would like to have a little chat with you regarding gifts. This year especially, when money should not be squandered, wouldn't it be a wise plan for you to caution your readers to confine their giving to strictly useful articles, instead of something that is showy, expensive and many times useless to the recipient.

"I want to tell you that of a number of many pretty things which came to me last year, the most pleasurable one was a pair of bed slippers. Now I think we usually associate these with older people, but I am young, and while my circulation is otherwise good I am much troubled with cold feet and cannot sleep as a result. These slippers can be purchased for fifty cents, but the pair I received were home-made. They come in all colors and are made of heavy Canton flannel. I am sure they would be suited to old and young, male and female.

"Now I hope what has proved such a boon to me will help others and so I close with a 'God bless you' for your helpful page."

"Last year," D. L. tells us, "I received such a pretty hand-made writing pad that I thought I would pass on the idea to you.

"Cretonne is made in so many patterns and can be bought at so low a price, I am sure many of your girls would like to make a cretonne writing-pad. The one I received measured 10 x 14 inches when folded. The materials needed for this pad are:

One piece of cretonne 11 x 29 inches.

Two pieces of cretonne 11 x 15 inches each.

Four triangular pieces of card-board, two inches on each side, covered with cretonne.

"Fold the large piece of cretonne half an inch on all four sides. Fold one of the smaller pieces in the same way and stitch it on to half of the larger piece. The four triangular pieces are then overhanded to the corners of this 11 x 15 piece.

"Next take the remaining piece of cretonne, folded in the same way as the others. On one end, measuring 11 inches, make a hem. This hemmed end is placed toward the center of the large piece, is left open and the remaining three sides are sewed, thus making a pocket for the stationery. A snap fastener on the inside of this pocket prevents the writing materials from falling out when the pad is opened.

"A blotter cut to size is fitted into the four corners and your writing pad is complete.

"This pad has proven a wonderful companion, and I have found it most useful and handy on vacations."

"I have little money to spend on my friends at Christmas time," B. E. W. tells me, "but I live in the country where there are plenty of lovely greens to be had for the taking. And so a few days before Christmas I always go out in the woods and gather evergreen and make it into wreaths which I tie with bows of red crêpe paper. My friends love them!"

"I am a shut-in," says G. M. S., "and you cannot imagine how much a Christmas gift that I received last year meant to me! A kind neighbor of mine put jars of her home-made jelly in a white box and tied it with ribbon and holly and left it at my door.

"It made me think of the jelly that I had made when I was young and strong. One can't, you know, buy real home-made jelly at the stores! And I enjoyed it for days.

"I have often wondered why more people don't send home-made pies and cakes and candies, and preserves to their friends!"

"Last year," writes M. L. F., "I decided that I could not afford gifts. So I purchased a number of pretty correspondence cards and traced tiny pictures on them, pictures which I colored with water color in the December evenings after my work was done. I enjoyed making them and when I had written a Christmas greeting on each one they were very lovely."

A LETTER

A LETTER, just a little folded letter,
But every line of it is penned with care,
A little letter touched with love and longing—
With longing for a Someone Over There.
A letter written in a fragile writing
(That was the way they taught in bygone years),
A letter—just a little folded letter—
Faint touched with longing and the mark of tears.

A letter (how the stamp on it is crooked,
As if the hand that placed it shook a bit!)
And how the name is written, almost firmly,
As if some mother heart was proud of it!
And how it's marked, "Don't open this till Christmas"!
(One sees a story, there, with just a glance—)
And how the tear-marks touch the very corner
Where mother fingers trembled and wrote "France"!

A letter, such a very little letter,
A letter to a Someone far away;
A letter full of cheer that covers heartache,
To greet a lonely boy on Christmas day;
A letter, just a little folded letter,
And every line of it is penned with care,
But on it one can see the mark of tear-drops,
And near it one can feel a mother's prayer.

OUR MAIL-BAG

NOTICE

THE editors of the Christian Herald will be glad to answer any question addressed to the Mail-Bag provided it be of general interest and not merely personal. Correspondents may use a nom de plume to identify the question, but all letters must contain name and address of the sender, in addition to the nom de plume. No attention will be paid to anonymous letters nor to those written with lead pencil.

Questions and Answers

ANNA M., St. Paul, Minn. Does history point to any period when the Jews were nearer to the realization of their great dream of national restoration than at the present time?

No: the aim of the Crusaders was the wresting of Palestine from the infidel, but the establishment of a Hebrew state was far from their thoughts. Nearly eight centuries have passed since then, and the world has changed in its estimate of the Jew and his destiny. Zionism has recognition today as it never had in the past. Whether it can be accomplished now or not remains to be seen. The Christian world is more than ever convinced that it will be brought about ultimately, though the time must be as God wills. Dr. Gray, in his articles in the Christian Herald, deals with this particular phase of prophetic fulfilment.

M. S. D., Youngstown, Ohio. "I am writing to you as a fellow parent, the mother of a little group of precious young souls, who have been given to me to train up to godly and useful manhood and womanhood. My children, I imagine, are like the average of our American boys and girls; but to me they are the dearest little people on earth. I am a partner in all their joys, a consoler in their sorrows, and I know that in their young hearts they love their mother with the pure, unselfish, devoted love of childhood. And when I look at them as they sit around me in the lamplight on these evenings, I feel more than at any other time what the great Lover of children really meant when he said, 'Of such is the Kingdom of Heaven.' One of our poets has given us the beautiful thought that 'Heaven lies about us in our infancy,' and it does or ought to; but alas! what can an American mother, with her happy little folks around her, say to them when she thinks of the sad condition of childhood in Europe today? I cannot thank the Herald sufficiently for the noble work it is doing through the Widows and Orphans Fund. But my heart is well-nigh breaking when I read of the sufferings of the orphan children of France and Belgium, of those in Poland and Austria, and of the fate of the little ones of Armenia and Syria, sad beyond any one's power to picture. I think, too, of the poor little flaxen-haired children of Germany, of whom we hear so little, but who must suffer like all the rest. As I tell my own little ones of the hundreds of thousands of Europe's children, once happy like themselves but now fatherless, homeless and dying of starvation, I can see by the wistful faces, the trembling lips and weeping eyes, that they regard it as an incredibly cruel thing that innocent children should be made to suffer through the war. They question me and cry so that I cannot bear it longer. So, thinking it all over, and knowing that in every American home there are young hearts that feel as deeply as my own children feel for the little sufferers of Europe, I have come to the conclusion that this great world sorrow, which spares not age nor childhood, is one in the alleviation of which the children of America should have a leading part. Parents would be delighted to send Christmas contributions in the names of their children. I almost wish that my pen might be inspired to write such a letter as would awaken the sympathies and open the hearts and the purse-strings of hundreds of thousands of American fathers and mothers. My own ones, I know, would gladly be among the first to lay their gifts upon the altar."

This letter from an American mother should find a response in every home. We print it for the prayerful consideration of our readers and of all lovers of little children everywhere.

E. M., San Diego, Calif. "In regard to an article in the Christian Herald of October 24, 1917, by H. A. B., of Arlington, Wis., I wish to say that during the three years that I served in the army in the Civil War, the government issued whisky to us not to exceed a half-dozen times, and then only about from one to three tablespoonfuls to a man. It is true that there were many men, who were drinkers before they enlisted, who obtained whisky from citizens while on a march. I was with General Sherman on his campaign from Chattanooga, Tenn., to Atlanta, Ga., from May 4 to September 18, 1864, and not a drop of whisky was issued to the soldiers by the government on that campaign. And I learned enough of General Sherman then to know that he was too good a commander to allow his commissary train to haul whisky for his men instead of crackers. But it was easy enough for men who wanted whisky to get it from citizens while on a march. Men who drank before the war drank after; but the discharged soldiers, as a class, made as good and sober citizens as those who were never in the army."

E. P. D., Los Angeles. "I was in the cavalry in the Sherman campaign. We were passing from one part of the fighting line to another. Our boys were very well supplied with food. Not one man drunk did I see. Uncle Sam kept the liquor from the boys in blue as much as possible."

A Gift That Will Help Thousands

AMERICAN COMMITTEE FOR ARMENIAN AND SYRIAN RELIEF

1 Madison Avenue, New York, November 17th, 1917.

President of the Christian Herald,
Bible House, New York City.

Dear Sir: I cannot tell you how cheered we are by the substantial contribution of twenty-five thousand dollars ($25,000) which you sent us in this morning's mail as the Thanksgiving Offering from your readers for the relief of suffering in Western Asia.

We will at once cable this money to our representatives in Constantinople, who in turn, with the full consent of all governments concerned, will transmit it to the American missionaries and others who are remaining in Western Asia, for the sole purpose of administering this relief.

We understand that $10,000 of your readers' contribution is to be devoted to relief work conducted in and around the Holy City by the American Colony in Jerusalem. To this $10,000 I think our Committee will probably add another $15,000, giving to our Jerusalem friends a total of $25,000 for Jerusalem alone, exclusive of other portions of Syria and Armenia.

Probably no one can ever know or fully comprehend the relief and the new life and hope which this $25,000 from your readers will bring to thousands of lives.

In behalf of the Committee, I am

Very sincerely yours,
C. V. VICKREY,
Secretary.

J. W. B., Mexico. "On the second page of your issue of October 10 you have an inquiry from an Old Subscriber in Knoxville, Iowa, about 'saluting the flag at Vera Cruz.' Let me say that both the question and the answer are somewhat mixed in the Herald. The flag episode was not at Vera Cruz but at Tampico. The Mexican government did not refuse to salute the flag, but they did say, 'We will salute your flag if immediately after you will salute ours.' The government at Washington had diplomatic reasons for refusing the conditions, and there the matter ended. The landing of American troops at Vera Cruz, April 21, 1914, was a different episode. The Tampico affair may have been a contributing influence in the case, but the occupation of Vera Cruz was a quite different affair."

Reader, Pittsburg, Pa. Why should not a Christian be cheerful? There is too much of a tendency, in many cases, to make the religious life seem one of sadness and unrelievable gloom. One result of such an attitude is that many are repelled who would be won if the cheerful side of Christianity were oftener displayed. The Christian has a right above all others to be cheerful. Love, comfort, consolation, joy, are not terms of wickedness, as some morbid minds mistakenly seem to imagine. Indeed, some of the finest Christians we know—men and women who are doing splendid service for Christ and humanity—are warm-hearted, impulsive and easily moved to laughter or to tears. We hold with the apostle that "foolish talking or jesting" is unprofitable; but there is a real virtue in innocent joy and laughter which is not marred by coarseness or an unworthy purpose. These are our views, and we preach and practice them as we go forward, for they help to lighten others' burdens and to make the road more pleasant.

G. S. L. 1. The writer in Eph. 4 : 8-9 is quoting from Ps. 68 : 18, where the victory over Syria and Ammon is exalted and where the Lord is described as ascending to heaven to maintain there also the interest of his people. As God through Israel vanquished his foes, so Christ antitypically triumphed over and bound everlastingly Satan, sin and death, which once held man captive (see Col. 2 : 15; 1 Cor. 15 : 54). The giving of gifts has been variously explained. One of these explanations, by Braune, says that the gifts consist in men—his captives—to whom he has given gifts of grace, that they themselves may and can become gifts to men in wider circles. 2. From Luke 23 : 43, Christ's assurance to the thief on the cross; Luke 16 : 19-31, the parable of Dives and Lazarus, and from Phil. 1 : 23, describing Paul's desire for death so as "to be with Christ," the inference is drawn that man goes immediately after death to his reward and does not wait for the resurrection.

Earnest Inquirer, Sturgis, Mich.: 1. When one is deeply concerned about sin and his soul's condition, it is evidence that the Spirit is still striving with him, and that he has not sinned away the day of grace. 2. If you believe in Christ and his redemption, if you have accepted him as your Saviour, if you want to serve him and do his bidding, then take courage and be of good cheer. Give yourself wholly and unreservedly to him and he will take care of you through thick and thin. Even the saints had occasional periods of depression and doubt. They had the assaults of "the old Adam" to contend with, and all of them had an uphill fight at times, but God gave them the victory. He will keep you and help you to triumph over sin and every doubt, if you ask him in faith.

Mrs. L. C. W., Eldred, Pa. 1. The word "creature" used by Paul in Rom. 8 : 19 has received divergent explanations. Thus the English translation of the Greek makes the variation of using both "creature" and "creation" to translate the same Greek word. Undoubtedly the apostle refers to the things created, and not to the act of creation, and means the whole creation, rational as well as irrational. The whole creation is looking forward to redemption: all natural birth to a new birth. 2. We do not need any argument in favor of God's scheme of redemption. 3. That there is no opportunity for repentance after death cannot be absolutely proved, but the trend of Bible teaching is in that direction. The passage in Eccles. 11 : 3 is often quoted in proof, though the inference is not decisive. So also in Rev. 22 : 11. Another passage implying the hopelessness of the lost is Luke 16 : 26: "Between us and you there is a great gulf fixed, so that they which would pass from hence to you cannot," etc. The burden of proof seems to be on those who contend that there is opportunity of repentance after death.

Mrs. C. O., Blairstown, Iowa. In the passage in I Cor. 5 : 5, the discipline meant by the apostle was corrective rather than destructive. The depraved inclination was to be destroyed in order that the soul might be saved. It is likely that the form of punishment meant was excommunication or cutting off from the company of the saints, thereby giving the person such an awakening as would lead him to think of getting himself fit again to associate with the elect.

J. C., Kan. 1. The Red Cross is international and strictly undenominational. It is certainly not an institution connected with the Catholic Church. 2. Offerings among the Hebrews indicated a very great number of things and were of four kinds: public or private, prescribed or free-will. The latter, mentioned in Lev. 22 : 18, Deut. 16 : 10; Num. 15 : 3, and Ezra 3 : 5, were offerings of gratitude, apart and separate from the prescribed offering without which certain rituals and rites could not proceed.

V. A. S., Johnstown, Ohio. We have not the space here to print Luther's Theses in full. Any book on the life of Luther and on the Reformation gives them. There are such in our advertising columns.

C. W. W., Batesville, Ind. The reasons for our being in this war have been stated and restated by our President to be "To make the world safe for democracy, and to safeguard the interests of the United States against German aggression."

E. H., Salt Point, N. Y. Your friend must surely have misunderstood the minister, who, as a Christian, could not have been forgetful of the fact that Jesus taught his followers to love their enemies and to "pray for them that despitefully use you" (Matt. 5 : 44; Luke 6 : 28). Again and again is the divine counsel to forgiveness repeated throughout the Master's teachings. One of the great things needed in the present crisis is the realization of the fact that Christ's teaching is what is needed to save the world.

C. F. B., a reader of this journal, living in Maypearl, Texas, sends us a letter which is really an excellent little homily, and we give it for the benefit of others. He writes: "I believe that one of the world's greatest needs today is simply kindness toward our fellowman. There would not be nearly so many suicides were we more cheerful, friendly, and kindly toward the troubled ones we come in contact with every day of our lives. There are many who are carrying heavy loads that the world knows nothing of, when a kind word and a little friendly counsel and sympathy might change their whole lives and save a soul from death. May God grant us the grace to seek to bear one another's burdens, and so fulfil the law of Christ."

A Reader, Booneville, Miss. The only way out of spiritual darkness is through firm faith in Christ. Spiritual darkness—doubt as to the safety of our soul—always means that we are doubting him. We are tempted to think that something is necessary to be done before we can trust him, some duty to be performed, some sacrifice to be made, some problem to be solved. But these things come after faith, not before it. The only requirement for salvation is to trust in Christ. Christ died for the ungodly, and when you believe that he died for you, to make possible the forgiveness of your sins; when you believe that, because he died, your sins are forgiven and your heart cleansed, you will have peace, and will find him near you ready to succor and strengthen you with his comfort and power. Read Isa. 55, Matt. 5 : 8, 10; Matt. 7 : 7-11; Rom. 6; Rom. 8 : 11; Gal. 3.

Mrs. L. R., Redwood Falls, Minn. No such passage in the Bible. It does, however, tell us to "train up a child in the way he should go, and even when he is old he will not depart from it" (see Prov. 22 : 6).

Mrs. L. M. S., Dayton, Ohio. The income of every single woman, where it is over $1,000, is now subject to taxation. It is true that this taxation in many states is without representation. The women of America are "doing their bit," and doing it nobly. They have worked like Trojans in behalf of the new army, the Red Cross, the food conservation and the Liberty Loan. And now the workers, hundreds of thousands of them, are to give of their meager earnings. Yet they do not flinch; our women are ready for every sacrifice. It would be a fitting and timely thing if the legislatures of other states not yet in the suffrage line should follow the example of New York and put the seal of recognition upon the women's efforts.

Why Russia Will Not Fight

The Bolsheviks and Other Revolutionary Factions Preferring Freedom to War—Where German Propaganda Succeeded

By MAYNARD OWEN WILLIAMS

Passed by the Russian Censor. Received through the American Diplomatic Mail

REVOLUTION has not changed the Russian. He is the same good-natured person he was before: a non-fighter in the midst of a world war. He has fought in the past because he has had to, and with the advent of a freedom which he understands as a freedom of privilege rather than a freedom of rights, he has lost the spur that has hitherto driven him into a fight he has never liked.

The Russian, slow to anger and slow to think, can understand the fraternizing force of international brotherhood, but it goes against his grain to fight, and he does not realize the danger that lies in a triumph of militarism. He understands oppression from above, for he has been subject to it for centuries; but he has no fear of oppression from abroad.

Russia is lacking in tradition. She has no sense of the "thin red line." Mass and not patriotism has been her strength, and her defeat at the hands of Japan was the result of an inferior patriotism behind the armies, rather than the inferior fighting power of the individual Russian soldier. Port Arthur was too far from the heart of Russia, just as Riga and the southwest front is too far from the farms of the peasants. Not only will they not fight their enemies, but they will not feed their own men, since both patriotism and nationalism are lacking. They do not lack humanity so much as social contacts, not courage so much as principles and aims. When the Russian spirit rises, as it did three centuries ago and again one century ago, Russian arms will once more advance through the power of masses who possess a sense of direction and unity of spirit.

Just as the war robbed the revolution of its choicest men several months before the abdication of the Czar, so the revolution, with its individualistic aims, has robbed the fighting machine of Russia of its unity and power. The steam roller is as heavy as ever, but there is no steam in the boiler. Will, mind and ideals are absent and hence man-power is impotent—a burden rather than a force.

TODAY, the Bolsheviks, or extreme Socialists, place the autocracy of Czardom side by side with the autocracy of war, and, having downed one, aim to free themselves from the other. But they cannot see that, in order to bring this about, they must coöperate with others who seek the same end, but who can accomplish their desire only through a temporary sacrifice to an ideal which requires strict discipline and unrelenting determination. German ideas have subjugated those whom German guns could not crush. The German cause is known throughout Russia and is espoused by some who are forced to fight against Germany while they believe in fraternizing with her. But the Allies, supplying money, medicines and munitions in a vain effort to bolster up a needed colleague, have been strangely reticent in supplying Russia with a knowledge of the ideal of justice, humanity and liberty, for which they are fighting. For three years and more, Germany has been mobilizing the force of Russian thought and loyalty, while the Allies, with a reliance in material forces which one would hardly expect in idealists, have supplied guns that have been surrendered, railway cars that have hurried them toward eager German hands, and money which has helped to subsidize disorganization and undemocratic anarchy.

A broad chasm exists between the chaotic spirit of Russia and the self-abnegating soul of France. Russia the feared, when freed of despotism, has revealed Russia the impotent. France the decadent, when invaded, has revealed France the immortal.

I found Abbé A. Gratieux at a meeting of the great Sobor, the first Church Assembly that Russia has held for 249 years. His clean shaven face and mobile lips shone out in that mass of bearded ecclesiastics like a beam of light penetrating a dense jungle. The Abbé has spent many months at the French front, comforting the dying, inspiring the youthful, and sharing the privations of the soldier of France. Recently he has come to Russia to visit the armies and offer aid to the officers in their attempt to bring order out of chaos. He knows the French soldier as few know him. He has visited the Russian front at many points. He sees the uselessness of war materials in the hands of those who have no desire to use them. He knows how Russian Church formalism has failed to inspire with dynamic ideals those simple folk.

He believes that the greatest duty of the Allied nations is a great campaign of propaganda among the people of Russia, instructing them, through the press and through personal contact, in the hopes and ideals of those who are fighting the long and arduous battle for humanity. At my request he has written his impressions of Russia, as he has seen it in trench and factory, in the home and before the ikonastas. He has also given me, for publication, a wonderful revelation of the soul of France. He writes:

"THE Russian has a very profound sentiment of the Absolute. He acts, not from the impulse of some material advantage for himself or for others, but from the conviction that he is working for the triumph of justice. More, perhaps, than any other people, he has a sentiment of charity, of universal brotherhood; it has never been difficult to get him to pity his adversary and even to fraternize with him. On the other hand, he is less logical, less exact, less steady in his work than the more practical peoples of the Occident. He is content with his dream and seems to fear lest he lose it through contact with reality. Thus often all his activity expends itself in words, and only too rarely or too late descends into the domain of practical action.

"Russian idleness is proverbial, and the national consciousness is not yet sufficiently awakened to shake off this lethargy, to banish the disorder and the disorganization which are its inevitable consequences. The gulf which for two hundred years has been forming between the high classes of the nation, carried away by imitation of the Occident, and the people, which, left to itself, has not been able to develop the principles of its own life and its national energy, has also contributed to this anarchy. Furthermore, the confusion and the incapacity of the ruling classes facing the agonizing questions of the present hour are matched only by the antagonism of the masses toward whatever shows any sign of social superiority.

"The church itself, in this country so deeply religious, has lost, for the moment at least, the greater part of her prestige. Held too long in tutelage, she does not yet know how to think and act for herself. At the same time, the souls too long subjected to an enforced practice of forms take advantage of emancipation to free themselves from ceremonies which were for them nothing but a heavy yoke. It will take time for religion to regain its power as a living and a conscious force.

"In this situation Germany has had no difficulty in organizing disorder. Unfortunately Russia's allies have done nothing to counterbalance the immense effort of the Germans. While the German agents were spending millions, the propaganda of one of the great Allied nations disposed of only ten thousand rubles a month. The Germans have got their hands on the press, especially in the southwest of Russia, where, aside from those of Kiev, all the newspapers are owned by Jews of German sympathies. Their readers are kept well informed on all German matters, but on those of the Allies they get nothing but scanty or deceptive information.

"The Allied propaganda by the spoken word has been as badly neglected as that by the press. Hence the Russian people does not know its allies; it is ignorant of the noble motives that have armed and sustained their courage; it knows nothing of the immense moral effort maintained by France, England, America and Italy; in them it sees scarcely more than the capitalists and the imperialists which the German propagandists have pictured to it.

"We have thought it was enough to leave it to the Russians to discover us of themselves; to place in their hands the perfected weapons which we make, without considering that this beautiful war material would one day be yielded up by them without fighting, and that thus one would lose at a stroke much more than the millions shrewdly spent by Germany. It is necessary to help the Russians to organize themselves. How to give this aid is hard to say, but it is certain that they cannot pull through alone, and that the best men among them turn their eyes toward the Allies.

"It is high time to consider this, for the simple people, struck by the power of the German organization, come sometimes to look upon the victory of Germany as the lesser evil. 'At least,' they say, 'they will give us order.' It is necessary to reach this people, to awaken its soul and its consciousness by a personal and living contact, by the spoken and the printed word reach its thought and feelings, making it understand the moral significance of its efforts, the scope of the sacrifices which it is called upon to make. Upon this depends the resurrection of the Russian people, lying in a fatal slumber from lack of light and direction, 'wandering and miserable, like sheep which have no shepherd.'"

IN China, at Chengtu, nearly two thousand miles inland, among a people whose direct effect upon the great war is practically negligible, I found British propaganda being extensively carried on, largely by means of colortype pictures, while in Russia very little Allied propaganda has been attempted. Under the old régime this might have seemed interference or lack of confidence in an imperial ally. But in these troubled times there is no excuse for failing to provide the Russi

The fallen Premier Kerensky accompanied by his staff. On November 20th the staff had deserted and Kerensky had disappeared people, who might suffer most from a German victory or a separate peace, with a thorough knowledge of the ideals for which the Allies fight. Russia needs a conception of the conditions under which the war on its present bankrupting scale is justified.

The more extreme Socialists demand immediate publication of all war treaties, in order that the workingmen of the world may know what they are fighting for. This seems out of the question. But certain it is that a better understanding between the Russian people and their allies is not only necessary, if the morale of the Russian army is to be strengthened, but will be a long step toward a definition of the aims and hopes of the war. America asked the old régime to define its war-aims before we entered the mêlée, but has done almost nothing to acquaint the masses of present-day Russia with our own.

A single nation holds the longest battle front in history. Time and again her millions of men have proved themselves brave fighters. The force that hitherto drove them against the foe has been dissipated. They not only wander in doubt, but they retreat without firing a shot. It is not that they need munitions, for, even armed with clubs, they advanced in Galicia. It is not that they need food, for they live better than before the war. It is not that they need advice. Russia has had a broadcast sowing of that. They need such an ideal as Russia had when Napoleon saw the leaping flames of sacrifice and unity behind the long walls of the Kremlin; not a death penalty to prevent retreat, but a cause for which they will advance.

Winter will soon hold the armies of Russia and Germany in its iron grasp. Then will come the spring campaign? Only a knowledge of the Allied war-aims and a belief in them can stem the tide of demoralized Russian soldiers that is sweeping back upon her own fields and homes.

DURING the last two weeks one thousand Russian soldiers who have been in German prisons have returned to Petrograd. In spite of Prussian power and Teutonic thoroughness, hundreds of men who hate Germany and who love freedom have found their way back to their native land, and have arrived there, when their return means much in Russia's efficiency. For every one of them is determined to wage war on war and crush militarism by military methods.

There are a thousand factors in the change that is taking place in Russia, and many of these factors work at cross purposes. But one of the remarkable things is the frankness of the Russian government to its people. There is not a defeat that is not reported.

The government is taking the people into its confidence and trusting, perhaps without justification, to the manhood of its citizens to defend her. At the depot of the General Staff, where government maps are sold at low rates, and where any citizen can secure the latest manuals on war tactics and allied topics, there is one map which is the most fascinating, graphic representation of the war that I have yet seen. It represents the territory now in the hands of the Central Powers as a gigantic spider's web, with the spider itself pictured at Berlin. The fascination and hypnotism of that map cannot be described, but every day there are great crowds studying it. Detail maps of small sections of the Russian front show the divisions engaged and the progress or retreat of the Russian armies. The government is playing the war game with all its cards on the table.

THE Bolsheviks, the Oliver Twists of Russia, who are always wanting more, have utilized the press and free speech to great effect both at the front and behind it. Their papers contain few advertisements and few telegrams, but much opinion and argument. An editor with whom I talked said that he could not print such a paper without a serious loss, which must be made up by contributions, but he could not of course say whether German money or subscriptions from the laborers made up the deficit.

Against the anarchistic words of the extreme socialists, the committee of escaped prisoners from Russia have been raising their voices as loudly as possible. Peace and brotherhood is such a reasonable thing that it requires those who know Germany from the inside and have suffered from German methods to keep up the fighting spirit in Russia. They say that force is absolutely necessary, for Germany uses fair words but foul methods. They have no illusions about the ability of Germany to give freedom to Russia. In spite of the disorganization that the revolution has caused at the front, and the economic disorganization that the absence of twenty million men from industry and agriculture has caused in Russia proper, they know that disorder with freedom is better than order with slavery. Every man of these hundreds wants to see Germany crushed, trusting to the blessings of peace and enlightenment through education to secure to the Russian peasant and laborer his needs. The returned Russians have had a reason for risking death in order to return home. Their life in orderly Germany has been miserable, due to the harsh treatment they have received. While thousands of Austrian war prisoners in Russia are walking in the parks, chatting freely with such people as can understand them and driving wood wagons for storing up fuel which they will benefit by, Russian prisoners are trussed up to posts and treated brutally by civilians as well as soldiers. German and Austrian prisoners in Russia have been received into the Russian homes.

But no such welcome greets the Russian prisoner in Germany. Not only are the men brutally treated, but they are made fun of in cruel ways. Their rations are scanty, and from one month to another they are hungry. In Germany there are huge central kettles from which the prisoners are fed one liter of thin soup at a meal. Sometimes the Germans leave some soup in the kettle and tell the famished men that they can have it. The Russians, with a lack of order that is characteristic, rush at the kettle and overturn it, and the leader of the committee said that he had seen Russians on their bellies beside the kettle, drinking up any puddles of soup that could be found, while the Germans stood by and laughed at them. Fire flashed from his eye as he told me of this. A Russian does not forget being humbled in such a way before his enemies.

THE aims of the committee which has been formed are twofold: first, to inform Russian public opinion of conditions in Germany, and inspire constant vigilance and aggression against the foe, and second, to organize assistance by sending food and clothing to the prisoners and using every possible means to protest against violence done to them.

Mr. Retewych, my informant, believes that all the Allies are doing their duty, but speaks most enthusiastically of France. The Russian prisoners in Germany, feeling that the Russian armies were being hampered by treason in official circles, longed to see the revolution break out in Russia. But those who have returned are willing to give any power to the government and to the army officials if only discipline can be restored and the war continued to a successful conclusion, which they conceive as victory for the Allies, no matter how long the war lasts. The committee has sent several men to the front to speak to the soldiers. Some of them have been very well received, and some have been forced to withdraw. They deplore the willingness of the Russian to applaud any speaker with a glib tongue and then give equal praise to the man who stands for the opposite.

"Russians talk too much and listen too thoughtlessly," said the man who had come back from bondage and was trying, almost in vain, to make his people feel what bondage to Germany means.

ALTHOUGH the entire German people is short of food and near-famine conditions exist, the prices there are no higher than in Russia, and there are almost no bread-lines. The enormous amount of time that is wasted in Russian bread-lines is utilized in Germany. Each person gets very little, but he can get it at any time, and he is sure that there will be enough to go round. In Petrograd this is not the case.

Mr. Retewych believes that if the food supply of Russia were organized all would be much better fed than are the people of Germany, who have confidence in the fact that the little which they can buy with their tickets will be ready for them when they are ready to get it.

But there are other reasons why Russia, which normally raises fifty-one per cent. of the world's rye, thirty-three per cent. of the barley and twenty-two per cent. of the wheat, and is usually an exporter of foodstuffs, is short of food for herself this year. Russia mobilized too many men for her army and too few for her industries and agriculture. She did not count on the war lasting as long as it has, and tried to crush Germany by mass rather than by staying power. This made farm labor scarce and dear, and the farmer could not raise his normal crop. Many of the farms have been managed entirely by women, and well managed. But fewer acres have been planted than usual.

The peasants, expecting a division of the pomieschik land, which was held by large landholders, tilled the pomieschik land in order to establish a claim to it, and left their own fields untilled.

At a conservative estimate Russia is feeding 15,000,000 soldiers at present, and they are better fed than they ever were in their lives. Only a part of them are at the front, or retreating from it under arms, and the rest are idle but voracious consumers of food. The enemy is occupying seventeen grain-producing gubernias and the remaining thirty-four have to feed not only their normal population, but millions of refugees as well. A restricted Russia is feeding an enhanced population.

The farmer cannot get needed supplies in return for his grain and he is hoarding it. Why he should be forced to produce food, when neither industry nor the army is producing results, he cannot see.

I ASKED the returned soldiers what they thought about America's entry into the war. They were enthusiastic. "Better late than never," said one. "We don't need soldiers so much as supplies," said another.

They seemed agreed that America has not entered the war for any selfish reason, and that she only came in after having used every peaceful means without affecting Germany's war methods. One said he thought America had come in now so as to have the right to curb any imperial ambitions that her Allies might have, and that she was paying the price now for freedom from militarism on the part of her Allies as well as her enemy. But they thought the Russian peasants could not understand why America could fight, unless she intended to win some material advantage.

Russians of sorts were allowed to escape by Germany, and doubtless there were many such active in Russia at the present time. Under the old régime, the secret service swallowed up these men the minute they crossed the boundary, but with disorganization and change of government, some of these German agents of Russian birth had doubtless entered the heart of Russia, where they posed as Bolsheviks or Internationalists. Flying squadrons of returned prisoners, who hate Germany, have gone throughout Russia, lecturing to the people and trying to keep up the Russian spirit. Their work consisted not only in preaching war against Germany but in neutralizing the destructive influence of the extreme Socialists, who preach that a German workman is a closer friend than a Russian capitalist, and that if all the workmen of the world would unite, the laboring men would enjoy true freedom.

Two of the men visited fifty villages in a month, and were well received by all. In Kharkov, a single audience subscribed 10,000 rubles to aid their work. They have confidence that their work will tell and feel that the extreme Socialists are gradually losing their grip, since the country has not prospered during the period in which their power has been greatest. One of them said: "Winter will give Russia a breathing-spell, and she can learn much before spring comes again. If she can learn what freedom really means before the German push is resumed, she will fight well."

Adventures in Neighboring

A Department for the Exchange of Experiences between Rural Women Who Have High Community Ideals and Are Putting Them into Practice

Conducted by VERA L. CONNOLLY

I WISH you could know how thrilling is the privilege of opening my mail! From every corner of the United States, and even from far-off Canada, you write in; and surely no letters ever contained so much pure unselfishness, so many high ideals, such accounts of community service, as those heaped on my desk. Reading them is like being present at a meeting of the largest and noblest woman's club imaginable.

Sometimes a "member" rises to tell how, with the aid of others, she has been able to befriend her community. Or a delegate relates, with misty eyes and unsteady voice, how her community has befriended her.

THE following letter is just such an expression of gratitude. And because of the beautiful spirit that breathes through it, and also because I wish to do honor to a community so filled with brotherly love, I am giving it first place. The writer begins it thus simply:

My husband died, very suddenly, at night, in the depths of a cold winter: leaving me alone, and in straitened circumstances, in a village where I was a stranger.

The other women in the village were all very busy, doing their own work and burdened with many cares. Yet they came to me at once. Willing hands soon filled my empty pantry shelves, arranged the house, looked after all the other details. In addition, these neighbors threw open their homes to receive any arrivals.

The men of the place, knowing my financial circumstances, helped in every way they could—even the doctor, notary, etc., refusing to take any pay. They all made me feel as though I lived in a neighborhood of sisters and brothers.

This same community of kindly men and women is now paying the taxes of a "neighbor," so that she may keep her little home, and they look after her needs in many ways. They have also sent to another county and brought back the body of a poor woman, that she might be buried in her home town, with appropriate services, and not as a county charge.

OUR second letter deals with a theme which will frequently be given room in this column: that is, the making of country life attractive to our boys and girls. The young folks are the life of every community. When they are listless, a neighborhood is dead. When they are alive and interested, it is wide awake and progressive. Here is how one rural woman helped:

Our community had no healthful social life for the young people. The boys hung around the village store or pool-rooms; and neither boys nor girls had an outlet for their natural desire for good times with each other.

Recognizing this, I appealed to our high school principal. As a result, an Athletic Association was formed, which was to be a social club as well.

Two teams of girls were organized to play against each other; while the boys got up a fine team which played every week against outside teams. Often the girls gave an exhibition game, which aroused the enthusiasm of students, parents, and townspeople. The hall was filled every time there was a game scheduled.

Our students came from a scattered community covering five or six miles; and, although citizens of the same town, they were often unacquainted. To overcome this and encourage friendliness between the various sections, we started the custom of a monthly social for them all.

The opening one in the fall was a reception to the entering class, the last one in the spring a reception to the graduating class. The months between were variously assigned. The principal took charge of one, and each class was responsible for one month's entertainment. One month the School Committee was asked to be a Social Committee, and responded heartily, furnishing us with a most enjoyable evening.

There were no charges, money for refreshments being taken from the treasury of the Athletic Association. Occasionally guests were invited; but the socials were primarily for the students. Practically every student was present every month; and soon religious differences and social cliques were forgotten, and the boys and girls of the whole region were one in interest and enjoyment. Petty quarrels between various sections, and even between parents, became things of the past. But most important: the boys and girls looked to the school for their fun, instead of yearning for the movies in the next town, the village store, or the pool-room.

OUR next letter is from the virile, breezy Northwest: from a rich valley in Idaho. Apart from the fact that it is exceedingly interesting, I give it space this week in order to illustrate a point I should like to emphasize. It is this: the modest writer of this letter has devoted too much space to the organizing of this fine club and too little to what the club accomplished in the way of community betterment. She makes tempting mention of several big things it has done; and an account of those we are going to beg from her, later. Following is her letter, which made me wish I could hop on the train and go out for a long and enthusiastic chat with its writer.

Our valley is a farming community, fifteen miles from a town. The population numbers fifty families of substantial, well-to-do people, but until two years ago there had never been an organization of any kind here.

Just two years ago this fall some of us began to talk "club" as a means of getting away from home and seeing our neighbors oftener.

We planned a meeting and formed a club. We bring our fancy work, have a splendid program, and partake of refreshments. We meet twice a month, and our programs are all planned out a year ahead by a Program Committee, and then printed in book form, so that each member knows exactly when she is to be hostess. The membership list numbers thirty-six names; and we all manage to attend.

It would take too long to tell of our various activities, which include civic improvement, charity, and education; but if Miss Connolly finds this first letter worth publishing I would be glad to tell you readers of the family of five we wintered, of how the Farmers' Institute came to us, of how we raised two hundred dollars to repair our cemetery, what we do with our club funds, and other things that interest us and which might interest you.

AS always happens, the end of this column has come into view long before the letters I have chosen are used up. But I am sure we can crowd in at least this one:

The most helpful thing in our community is the "free literature table" in the church: a little rural church situated in the heart of the country, eight miles from any town. This church means a great deal to us, some families driving five and six miles to attend it; and one of its greatest attractions is the free literature table.

We get our literature in many ways. First, really good magazines are brought by families with sons or daughters (away from home) who send subscriptions as Christmas gifts. Then, too, government bulletins are always on the table. And a State library provides us with fifty books, which are changed every six months. Everything is free to take home.

It seems to me this idea is one which might be worked out in many fine ways.

AND now, before bidding you godspeed until next week, I would like to allay the friendly curiosity of us all regarding how the money earned by the Gipsy Camp (described several weeks ago) was spent. I promised you I would ask the writer. Here is her answer:

We gave part of the money to our community church—a struggling country church—to help paint the outside. The rest was used to buy linoleum for the church vestibule, to fresco the walls, and to paint and grain the woodwork.

Can't you see that discouraged little church blossoming under this loving aid? I can! And I wonder if there is not a church, a school or an individual in your community in need of just such help?

One way to increase poultry production is to banish the chicken mites.

The fish in the pasture creek ought to be thankful that Mr. Hoover did not say to eat them earlier in the season.

There's no law against eating turkey before and after Thanksgiving. The more poultry Americans eat at home the more red meat we can spare the boys in France.

CHAPTER XXVI

GILA had never been more beautiful than when she stood and uttered her terrible ultimatum to Courtland.

He rose to his feet, gone suddenly white and stern, and stood looking at her as if his own heart had turned traitor and slain him. A moment they stood in battle array, two forces representing the two great powers of the universe. Looking straight into each other's souls they stood, plumbing the depths, seeing as in a revelation what each really was!

To Courtland it was suddenly made plain that this girl had no part or lot in the things that had become vital to him. She had not seen, she would not see! Her love was not great enough to carry her over the bridge that separated them, and back over which he might not go after her!

Gila in her fierce haughtiness looked into her lover's eyes and saw, as she never had seen before, the mighty strength of his character! Saw that here was a man such as she would not likely meet again upon her way, and she was about to lose him forever. She stood with haughty mien and cold, flashing eyes, watching him suffer the blow she had dealt him; knew that it was more than his love for her she was killing with that blow, yet did not withdraw it while she might.

"Gila! Do you mean that?"

She looked him straight in the eye and thrust her sword in deeper with a steady hand. "I do!"

He stood for a moment looking steadily at her, then he turned as if to One who stood by his side, and said, clearly and distinctly:

"I choose!"

And with erect bearing he passed out of the door.

GILA stood, white and furious, her little clenched fists down at her sides, the sharp little teeth biting into the red underlip until the blood came. She heard the front door shut in the distance, and her soul cried out within her, yet she stood still and held her ground. She turned her face toward the library window. Between the curtains she could presently see his tall form walking down the street. Then he passed beyond her sight and she knew in her heart he would come to her no more! She had sent him from her forever!

Courtland never knew where he was walking as he went forth that day to meet his sorrow and face it like a man. He passed some of his professors, but did not see them. Pat McCluny came up and he looked him in the eye with an unseeing stare, and walked on!

Pat stood still and looked after him, puzzled!

"Great Mackinaw! What's eating the poor stew now!" he ejaculated. Then he turned and slowly followed, on through the city streets, out into the quieter suburbs, out farther into the real country, mile after mile; out a by-path where grass grew thick and wild flowers straggled under foot, where presently a stream wound soft and deep between steep banks, and rocks loomed high on either hand; under a railroad bridge and up among the rocks, climbing and puffing till at last they stood upon a great rock, McCluny just a little way behind and out of sight.

It was there in a sort of crevice, where the natural fall of the crumbling rocks had formed a shelter, that Courtland dropped upon his knees. Not as a spot he had been seeking for, but as a haven to which he had been led. He knelt, and all that Pat, standing, awed and uncovered, a few feet below, heard, was:

"O God! O God!"

THE sun was beginning to sink when at last Pat stepped up the rocks quietly and came and stood by Courtland, laying a gentle hand upon his shoulder. "Come on, old man, it's getting late. About time we were going back!"

Courtland got up and looked at him in a dazed way as if his soul had been bruised and he was only just recovering consciousness. Without a word he turned and followed Pat back again to the city.

When they reached the gates of the university Courtland put out his hand, speaking in his own natural tone: "Thanks awfully, old chap! Sorry to have made you all this trouble!"

"That's all right, pard," said Pat, huskily, grasping the hand in his big fist. "I saw you were up against it and I stuck around, that's all!"

"I shan't forget it!"

They parted to their rooms. It was long past supper-time. Pat went away by himself to think.

Pat said nothing even to Tennelly about his walk with Courtland. He was relieved to see that his friend came down to breakfast next morning with a white, resolute face, and went about the order of the day quietly, as if everything were as usual.

Tennelly and Bill Ward were on the alert. They had missed Courtland from the festivities the night before, but were so thoroughly occupied with their own part in the busy week that they had little time to question him. Later in the day Tennelly began to wonder why Courtland had not brought Gila, as he intended, for the class play, but a note from Gila informed him that she was done with Paul Courtland forever, and that he would have to get some one else to further his uncle's schemes, for she would not. She intimated that she might explain further if he chose to call, and Tennelly made a point of calling in between things, and found Gila inscrutable. All he could gather was that she was very, very angry with Courtland, hopelessly so, and that she considered him worth no more effort on her part. She was languidly interested in Tennelly and accepted his invitation to the dance that evening most graciously.

COURTLAND had spent the night upon his knees in the little sacred room at the end of the hall. He was much stronger to face things than he had been when he left her. So when he met Gila walking with Tennelly he lifted his hat courteously and passed on, his face grave and stern as when she had last seen him, but in no way showing other sign that he had suffered or repented his choice. Pat, walking by his side, looked furtively at Gila, then keenly at his companion, and winked to his inner consciousness.

"She's the poor simp that did the business! And she looks her part, b'leeve me!" he told himself. "But he'll get over that! He's too big to miss her long!"

The Commencement that would have meant everything to Courtland a few brief days ago was a weariness now. He wondered that everybody seemed so much interested in things and took so much trouble for a lot of nonsense.

He was surprised to see his father come into the great hall just as he went up on the platform with his class. He hadn't expected his father. He was a busy man who did not get away from his office often.

It touched him that his father cared to come. He changed his plans and made it possible to take the train home with him after the exercises, instead of waiting a day or two to pack up, as he had expected to do. The packing could wait awhile.

THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, New York, N. Y.

They had a long talk on the way, one of the most intimate that they had ever had. It appeared during the course of conversation that Mr. Courtland had heard of the offer made to his son by Ramsey Thomas, and that he was not unfavorable to its acceptance.

"Of course, you don't really need to do anything of the sort, you know, Paul," he said, affably. "You've got what your mother left you now, and on your twenty-fifth birthday there will be two hundred and fifty thousand coming to you from your Grandfather Courtland's estate. What's your objection to this job?"

COURTLAND told the whole story carefully, omitting no detail of the matter concerning conditions at the factory, and the matters at which he was not only expected to wink, but also sometimes to help along by his influence. He realized, as he told it, that his father would look at the thing fairly, but very differently.

"Well, after all," said the father, "that's all a matter of sentiment. It doesn't do to be too squeamish, you know, if you have ambitions. Besides, with your income you would have been able to help out and do a lot of good. You ought to have thought of that."

"In other words, earn my salary by squeezing the life out of them and then toss them a penny to buy medicine. I don't see it that way! No, dad, if I can't work at something clean I'll go out and work in the ground, or do nothing, but I won't oppress the poor."

"Oh, well, Paul, that's all right if you feel that way about it, of course. Ramsey Thomas wanted me to talk it over with you; promised to do the square thing by you and all that; and he's a pretty good man to get in with. Of course I won't urge you against your will. But what are you going to do, son? Haven't you thought of anything?"

"Yes," said Courtland, leaning back and looking steadily at his father. "I've decided that I'd like to study theology."

"Theology!" The father started. "H'm! Well, that's not a bad idea! Rather odd, perhaps, but still there's always dignity and distinction in it. You wouldn't have any trouble in getting a wealthy and influential church, either. I could manage that."

"I'm not sure that I want to be a clergyman, father. I said study theology. I want to know what scholarly Christians think of the Bible. I've studied it with a lot of scholarly heathen who couldn't see anything in it but literary merit. Now I want to see what it is that has made it a living power all through the ages. I've got to know what saints and martyrs have founded their faith upon."

"Well, Paul, I'm afraid you're something of an idealist and a dreamer like your mother. Of course it's all right with your income. Our old Doctor Bates is getting a little out of date and he'll be about ready to be put on the retired list by the time you are done your theological course. Had you thought where you will go? What seminary? Better make a careful selection; it has so much to do with getting a good church afterward!"

He was silent, realizing how impossible it would be to make his father understand. In the days when Courtland used to sit and kick his heels in the old family pew and be reproved for it by his aunt, he never remembered any Presence. Doctor Bates's admirable sermons had droned on over his head like the dreamy humming of bees in a summer day. He couldn't remember a single thought that ever entered his mind from that source. Was that all that came of studying theology? Well, he would find out, and if it was, he would quit it!

THEY were all comfortably glad to see him at home. His stepmother beamed graciously upon him in between her social engagements, and his young brothers swarmed over him, demanding all the athletic news. The house was big, ornate, perfect in its way. It was good to eat such superior cooking—that is, if he had been caring to eat anything just then; and there was a certain freedom in life out of college that he knew he ought to enjoy; but somehow he was restless.

Sometimes, when he was alone in his room, it seemed as if he and the Presence were there on a visit which neither of them enjoyed very much, and which they were enduring for the sake of his father, who seemed gratified to have his eldest son at home once more. But all the time Courtland was chafing at the delay.

In the second week Courtland decided to go back to the university and pack up. Gila would be away from the city by that time. The fellows would be all gone and he could do about as he pleased.

It was the second day after he went back that he met Pat on the street, and it was from Pat that he learned that Tennelly and Bill Ward had gone down to the shore to a house party given by "that fluffy-ruffles cousin of Bill's."

Pat drew his own conclusions from the white look on Courtland's face when he told him.

Pat clung to Courtland all that week, helped him pack, and dogged his steps. Except when he visited the little sacred room at the end of the hall in the dormitory. He was always on hand to propose a hike or a trip to the movies when he saw Courtland was tired. Courtland was grateful, and there was something so loyal about him that he couldn't give him the slip. So when he went down after Burns and whirled him away in his big gray car to the seashore Friday morning to stay until Saturday evening, Pat went along.

CHAPTER XXVII

THEY certainly were a queer trio, the little Scotch preacher, the big Irish athlete, and the cultured aristocrat! Yet they managed to have a mighty good time of it those two days at the shore, and came back the warmest of friends. Pat proved his devotion to Burns by attending church the next day with Courtland, and listening attentively to every word that was said. Courtland wondered, as he shared the hymn-book with him and heard him growl out a few bass notes to old "Rock of Ages," why it was that it seemed to fill him with a kind of exaltation to hear Pat sing. It was while they were singing that hymn that he stole a look at Pat, and felt a sudden wonder whether he would understand about the Presence or not, a burning desire to tell him about it some time if opportunity offered.

The days down at the shore had done a lot for Courtland. It was a quiet place, with a far, smooth beach, and no boardwalks nor crowds to shut out the vision of the sea. He leaped along the sand and dived into the water with his old enthusiasm. He played like a fish in the ocean. He taught Burns several things about swimming, and played pranks like a schoolboy. He basked in the sun and told jokes, laughing at Pat's brilliant wit and Burns's dry humor. At night they took long walks upon the sand and talked of deep things that Pat could scarcely understand.

It was out in the wildest, loneliest part of the beach that night that he heard the first hint of what had come to the soul of Courtland.

Courtland spent much time in the vicinity of the factory and of John Burns's church during the next few weeks. He helped Burns a good deal, for the man had heavily taxed himself with the burdens of the poor about him. Courtland found ways to privately relieve necessity and put a poor soul now and then on his feet. It took so pitifully little to open the gate of heaven to some lives! Courtland with his keen intellect and fine perceptions was able sometimes to help the older man in his perplexities; and once, when Burns was greatly worried over a bill that was hanging fire. Courtland went down to Washington for a week-end and hunted up some of his father's Congressional friends. He told them a few facts concerning factories in general, and a certain model, white-marble, much bevined factory in particular, that at least opened their eyes if it did not make much difference in the general outcome. But though the bill failed to pass that session, being skilfully sidetracked, Courtland had managed to stir up a bit of trouble for Uncle Ramsey Thomas that made him storm about his office wrathfully and wonder who that "little rat of a preacher" had helping him now!

It was late in September that Pat, with a manner of studied indifference, told Courtland of a rumor that Tennelly was engaged to Gila Dare.

IT was the very next Sunday night that Tennelly turned up at Courtland's apartment after he and Pat had gone to the evening service, and followed them to the church. He dropped into a seat beside Pat.

"You here!" he whispered, grasping Pat's hand. "Where's Court?"

Pat grinned and nodded up toward the pulpit.

Tennelly looked forward and for a minute did not comprehend. Then he saw Courtland sitting gravely in a pulpit chair by the little Scotch preacher.

"What!" he growled, almost out loud. "What's the joke?"

Pat's face was on the defensive at once, though it was plain he was enjoying Tennelly's perplexity. "Court's going to speak tonight!" It is probable Pat never enjoyed giving any information so much as that sentence in his life.

Tennelly looked again. That surely was Courtland sitting there. What could be the meaning of it all? Had Courtland taken to itinerary preaching? Consternation filled his soul. He loved Courtland as his own brother. He would have done anything to save his brilliant career for him.

He hadn't intended staying to service. His plan had been to slip in, get Courtland to come away with him, have a talk, and go back to the shore on the late train. But the present situation altered his plans.

That was a most unusual service. The minister read the story of the martyr Stephen and the conversion of Saul of Tarsus, taken from the sixth, seventh, eighth, and ninth chapters of Acts. It was brief and dramatic in the reading. Even Tennelly was caught and held as Burns read in his clear, direct way that made Scripture seem to live again in modern times.

"I have asked my friend Mr. Courtland to tell you the story of how he met Jesus one day on the Damascus road," said Burns, as he closed the Bible and turned to Courtland, sitting still with bowed head just behind him.

Courtland had made many speeches during his college days. He had been the prince among his class for debate. He had been proud of his ability as a speaker, and had delighted in being able to hold and sway an audience. He had never known stage fright. But ever since Burns had asked him if he would be willing to tell the story of the Presence to his people in the church before he left for his theological studies, Courtland had been just plain frightened. He had consented. Somehow he couldn't do anything else, it was so obviously to his mind a "call"; but if he had been a coward in any sense he would have run away and got out of it all but for his horror of being "yellow."

Since ascending to the platform he had been overcome by the audacity of the idea that he, a mere babe in knowledge, a recent scorner, should attempt to get up and tell a roomful of people, who knew far more about the Bible than he did, how he found Christ. But when he heard himself being introduced so simply, and knew his time had come, he seemed to hear the words he had read that afternoon:

> Fear not; for I am with thee: be not dismayed: for I am thy God: I will strengthen thee; yea, I will help thee: yea, I will uphold thee with the right hand of my righteousness.

COURTLAND lifted up his head and looked over the sea of faces. Then all at once Tennelly's face stood out from all the rest, intent, curious, wondering; and Courtland knew that his opportunity had come to tell Tennelly about the Presence!

Tennelly, the man whom he loved above all other men! Tennelly, the man who perhaps loved Gila! His fears vanished. His soul burned within him.

Fixing his eyes on that fine, vivid face, Courtland began his story; and truly the words that he used must have been drawn red-hot from his heart, for he spoke as one inspired. Simply, as if he were alone in the room with Tennelly, he looked into his friend's eyes and told his story, forgetting all others present, intent only on making Tennelly see what Christ had been to him.

Tennelly did not take his eyes from the speaker.

When Courtland had finished and sat down he did not drop his head upon his hands again. He had spoken in the strength of the Lord. He had nothing of which to be ashamed. He was looking now at the audience, no longer at Tennelly. He began to realize that it had been given to him to bear the message to all these other people also. He was filled with humble exaltation.

The people, too, were hushed and filled with awe. They lingered, many of them, and came up, pressing about him, just to touch his hand.

Paul Courtland stood there half embarrassed as they pressed about him. He took their hands and smiled his brotherhood, but scarcely knew what to say to them.

PAT and Tennelly stood back against the wall and waited, saying not a word. Tennelly watched the people curiously as they went out: humble, common people, subdued, wistful, even tearful; some of them with illumined faces as if they had seen a great light.

When at last Courtland drifted down to the back of the church and reached Tennelly, the two met with a look straight into each other's soul, while their hands gripped in the old brotherhood clasp. Not a smile nor a commonplace expression crossed either face—just that strong, steady look of recognition and understanding. It was Tennelly looking at Courtland, the new man in Christ Jesus; Courtland looking at Tennelly after he had heard the story.

They walked back to Courtland's apartments almost in silence, a kind of holy embarrassment upon them all. Pat whistled "Rock of Ages" softly under his breath most of the way.

They sat for a time, talking stiffly, as if they hardly knew one another, telling the news. Bill Ward had gone to California to look into a big land deal in which his father was interested. Wittemore's mother had died and he wasn't coming back next year for his Senior year. But it was all surface talk. Their thoughts were upon deeper things. But the recent service was not mentioned.

Finally Pat discreetly took himself off, professedly in search of ice-water.

When he had left the room Tennelly sat up alertly. He had something to say to Courtland alone.

The Millennium: When, What and Where?

Redeemer shall come to Zion, and unto them that turn from transgression in Jacob, saith the Lord" (Isa. 59: 19–20).

It is significant that this work of the Holy Spirit does not render unnecessary the personal coming of the Redeemer, and that it is in connection with that coming and as a forerunner of it that the Holy Spirit is thus named. Moreover, Scriptures might be multiplied to show that this same gracious agency shall continue to abide with Israel throughout the whole of the millennial period. See, for example, Isa. 39: 11–15; 44 : 2–5; and Zech. 12 : 10. But Joel goes still further and teaches that in that day the Holy Spirit shall be poured out "upon all flesh" (2 : 28, 29).

We think that an accredited student of prophecy is right when he says that "the judgments which accompany the Lord's return will have purged out the obstinately wicked of that generation, while the survivors, awed by those judgments and compelled to bow to the scepter of Jesus Christ, will, by this universal outpouring of the Holy Spirit, be generally turned in heart to the Lord."

"Generally," be it observed, but not entirely or universally. Every soul of man will not be converted, and regeneration will be as necessary then as now, if one shall enter into the kingdom of God. But in a sense or in a degree which until then the earth never will have known, it will be a time when "the glory of the Lord shall be revealed, and all flesh shall see it together" (Isa. 40 : 5).

POWDER

has demonstrated its effectiveness to the dental and medical professions continuously since 1908, at free clinics, devoted exclusively to pyorrhea treatment and prevention.

PYORRHOCIDE POWDER aids in repairing soft, bleeding, spongy, receding gums—manifestations of intermediate and advanced pyorrhea. It removes the bacterial plaques or films which harbor the germs of pyorrhea and decay. It removes the daily accretion of salivary calculus (tartar)—this calcic deposit is the principal, initial cause of loose teeth and

PYORRHEA

PYORRHOCIDE POWDER makes the gums hard and firm—increasing their power of resistance against pyorrhea infection, and it cleans and polishes the teeth.

Nehemiah Enforces the Sabbath Law

International Sunday School Lesson for December 16. Neh. 13

How Shall We Spend Sunday?

By Rev. George D. Allison, Ph.D.

SOON after the impressive proclamation of the law, which we studied last week, Nehemiah returned to Persia as he had promised King Artaxerxes to do. While he was there, Ezra seems to drop out of sight as inexplicably as did Zerubbabel in an earlier day. Without the steadying influence of these two reformers, affairs had badly relapsed into the slipshod heathenish ways of the surrounding country. How true it is that public morals are spasmodic and need again and again the stirring influences of idealists and prophets! We cannot let things take care of themselves. We who believe in the best must be eternally vigilant or the worst elements regain control.

The first shock that came to the sturdy reformer was to find his old enemy Tobiah entrenched in the enclosure of the temple itself. Thus it comes about in our own time that whenever the church relaxes her guard she will find un-Christian men invading the very precincts of ecclesiastical power. How much more then will she find her bitterest enemies holding the chief offices of state unless she is alert! Nehemiah believed the situation called for drastic action, and he pitched out Tobiah and his household stuff.

Nehemiah Finds the Tithes Unpaid

More serious still, the returning governor found that his well-laid plan of religious work had broken down for lack of funds. The Levites had not received their pay, and had been compelled to leave their duties in the house of God and to go out to work in the fields. So soon had the agreement to maintain public worship (chapter 10) been forgotten! There is a close relation between the church treasury and the prayer life of the members—much closer than unpractical judges imagine. If a man's religion loses all claim on his pocketbook it has already lost its hold on his heart.

Nehemiah dealt vigorously with this condition also. He recalled the Levites and the singers and set them in their places. He stirred up the whole land of Judah with an appeal for loyalty. The tithes began to come in. He then reconstituted the treasury with faithful men in charge.

One of his mightiest services was this setting the support of public religious work on a high plane of civic responsibility. It is not optional to dole out donations to maintain God's house. It is a first duty to set aside a right proportion, "according as the Lord hath prospered us," for the sake of our country and our fellow men.

Nehemiah Finds a Commercialized Sabbath

To his unspeakable dismay, the first Sabbath after his return revealed a total disregard of the Fourth Commandment. While he was away the Sabbath had been completely commercialized. The workmen were at their tasks, the victualers were selling food, the merchants were crying their wares upon the streets of the city. Nehemiah handled this situation energetically. He summoned the leaders of Judah and reminded them of the declaration by the prophets that Sabbath-breaking was one of the causes of the Exile (see Jeremiah 17). The next Sabbath he closed the gates against the foreign merchants. They lodged outside awaiting a favorable opportunity to enter, but when he threatened them with arrest they desisted. In all these matters the quick decision, the absolutely uncompromising temper of the governor saved the day.

The Sabbath for Man

Nehemiah put his emphasis on the command of the law which the Jews had covenanted to obey, and on the line of separation which was drawn between Jew and Gentile by such a custom as this. We today have more reasons for Sabbath-keeping, not less. We have higher and nobler purposes to serve than these men of Jerusalem knew. Jesus transfigured the Sabbath as he did other requirements of the Old Testament. He did not destroy, but uplifted and fulfilled.

First of all, he declared that the Sabbath was ordained, not for God's benefit, but for man's. He implies for man as man, and not only for the Jew. He cuts through the letter, which Pharisaism had distorted into belittling discussions, and stands for the spirit of the day. It is lawful to do good. It is lawful to heal, to do works of mercy. Whatever is conducive to life, to health, to righteousness is appropriate on the Sabbath. Jesus was called a Sabbath-breaker because he refused to take any petty legalistic view of the day and put it on the high plane of human welfare.

We have our special problems and needs as Nehemiah's time had, and as had the time of Christ. We are not in danger in Christian America in this year of grace 1917 of having a blue, hypocritical Sabbath. We are in danger of a profaned and vulgarized day.

How then shall we spend Sunday?

I. The Day of Rest

What a blessing to multitudes the day of rest has been! How, for example, the life of the open country has been ameliorated by the general observance of one day when only the absolutely essential "chores" are done! The hard toil of the farm has been mitigated by this. Today the principle of the civic Sabbath is everywhere accepted, though in practice there is much to be done. All public welfare organizations have adopted the slogan "one day's rest in seven for every worker." It means better work, and so the efficiency expert favors it. It means higher standards of life, so the philanthropist is back of it. It means a chance for religion, so the ecclesiastical authorities endorse it.

Just when we were gaining ground and hoped for legislation to compel this just and necessary boon to be granted to all, either on Sunday or some other day, the Great War came upon us. Horrible conditions of overwork have prevailed abroad. Even with the insatiable need for munitions it is proved that a man or women can turn out more shells in six days than in seven, in the long run. (That is, unless the saloon gets the seventh day.) Our own government has gotten out a pamphlet on industrial overwork in England and France. Perhaps some reader of this page can help secure the rest day for many by sending to Washington for this book and showing it to those in charge of factory or mine.

We must not be content to enjoy our day off while thousands labor on. In Deuteronomy we read "that thy manservant and thy maidservant may rest as well as thou." In our complex life we have thousands of "servants" in shop and field and railroad yard. It is our social duty to see that they rest too.

II. The Day of the Home

Just because we are so busy and our civilization so complicated we need the Christian Sabbath as a "home day." We can take that leaf from the book of the ancient Jew, to whom every Sabbath was a family reunion. Let the business man get acquainted with his children. Let the business girl or her brother talk things over with mother in the quiet hour. Many today do not know what a quiet hour is! When a lull comes they must rush off on pleasure bent. Let the whole family sing the dear old songs, and new ones too, before gathering around the Sunday evening table. Long ago Bobby Burns wrote, "Mid scenes like these old Scotia's grandeur lies." Are our young people growing up without such steadying memories as these?

A newspaper asks, "Is the Christian home a thing of the past?" Not where the Lord's Day is kept indeed as a home day as well as a church day, and where the evening meal is a sacrament of family fellowship.

Help for Baking Day

Mixing bowls, rolling pins, spoons, pans, are obstinate to clean when they get "stuck up. One woman made this discovery: Grease left by shortenings caused 9/10ths of the trouble. She looked around for grease-dissolvents. Gold Dust being the most effective and easiest, dissolved that 9/10ths of the trouble. It shortened the work of cleaning up after cooking.

ONE THOUSAND AND ONE REWARDS!

NATIONAL BIBLE PICTURE STUDY

Yes, literally that number of cash prizes—and also a multitude of mental and spiritual benefits impossible to valuate. Decide now to spend some of the long winter evenings in the fascinating Bible verse competition, in which $5,000.00 in cash will be given. What do you do with your evenings now? Waste them? Make them pay you the priceless treasure of increased Bible knowledge, and perhaps a large cash reward as well!

Reference Book

Our Reference Book, International Bible Readings, has a solid value quite apart from its use in the National Bible Picture Study.

It contains some 2,000 verses, selected from among the more than 31,000 verses in the Bible. From these verses participants in the Study choose the best verses for the 30 pictures. Only verses contained in this list are acceptable as answers for the pictures.

But these verses are not random selections—they are the actual International Sunday School Lessons, the Daily Home Bible Readings, and the Golden Texts for the entire months of December, 1917, and January, February, March and April, 1918.

In other words, here, word for word, appear the groups of Bible verses which are the International Sunday School Lessons and Home Bible Readings for a great part of the world!

Think what this means. Of course this is an invaluable book for Sunday School scholars and teachers. By having the verses printed out in full much time is saved that would be consumed in looking up the verses in the Bible.

But for all Christians the book is peculiarly valuable. The verses give striking portions of the Bible. They represent the research and judgment of eminent Bible authorities. Do you know your Bible so thoroughly that the reading over of these verses will not add to your happiness and content?

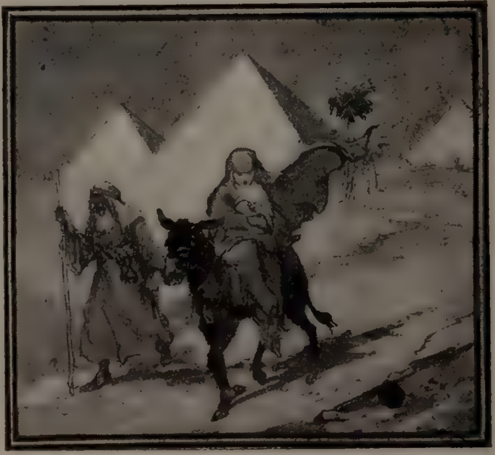
An Object Lesson



Just to demonstrate how you will compete we publish the example picture above.

Among the 2,000 verses comprised in our Reference Book, International Bible Readings, is a verse that fits this example picture well. Look at the picture again: Couldn't you pick out a verse that describes the scene?

When he arose, he took the young child and his mother by night, and departed into Egypt. Matt. 2 : 14.

That picture illustrates the Flight into Egypt, made by Joseph and Mary, carrying the infant Jesus away from the wrath of Herod.

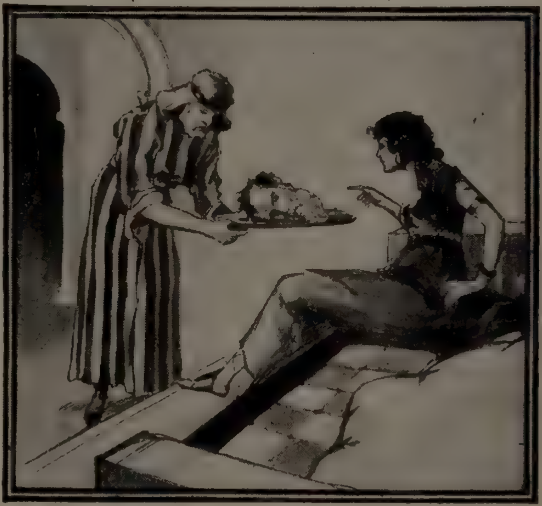
National Bible Picture Study

In the actual National Bible Picture Study you will compete exactly as described above for the example picture, except that when you have selected a verse for a picture you will write it down in the Answer Book, so that you may send in all your selections to us for all 30 pictures.

Those who make the best selections will receive the cash rewards.

But do you also see the spiritual value of the Picture Study, the way it brings the Bible thought home to you, makes it plain, impresses it upon your memory as a picture to carry in your heart always?

Picture No. 3.



Answer Book

After you select the verse you think best fits each picture you will write it down in the Answer Book, which is accompanied by the Reference Book, International Bible Readings, as part of the complete National Bible Picture Study Outfit. Then send the Answer Book in to us, and await the awarding of the prizes. The plan of the Study is simple—but the gain to you is great!

III. The Day of the Soul

We need rest badly enough. Undoubtedly we need the utmost emphasis on the home life of the rest day. But still more we need a day for the higher side of man, the day of the soul. The world is too much with us, soon and late. We forget that we are immortal spirits—that we have bodies but we are souls. The Sunday rest day should be so spent that it ministers to the moral and the spiritual. Herein is the importance of public worship, the community recognition of God, the social prayer of neighbors and friends who come together, not for business or pleasure, but for mutual stimulation in goodness and holiness. Otherwise God is left out, and the finer nature dulled imperceptibly, but surely. On the day of the soul we look together into this old Book that has given Christ to the world. We are made gentler, kinder by the remembrance of Him who died to bring us to the Father. It is an absolute fact that without church, people grow more careless, coarser, less spiritual. Very few men enter heaven alone, unaided, unaccompanied by fellow-travelers.

So I say, give the finer things a chance on the joyous day that commemorates the Resurrection of the Christ. Make it a holy day and not a mere holiday. That does not signify a gloomy day, with somber children sitting sulkily in a row! There is little danger of making your Sunday stiff and unpleasant. There is much that it will be vulgar and uninspiring, instead of hallowing and uplifting.

The true Sabbath will bring refreshment to body, mind and spirit. It will be a day of joy and peace and beauty. It will mean better manhood in the individual and higher ideals in the community. The sorrowful will be comforted and the rich and poor meet together before one Father. To honor the Lord's Day is a statesmanlike service today, for it is almost indispensable to American ideals. We must enforce the civil Sabbath by law. But more than that, we must live out the spirit of the day before the foreigner within our gates, and awaken the careless Christian to the spiritual graces he is missing by refusing to "remember the Sabbath Day to keep it holy."

Sunday School Methods

BY FRANK L. BROWN, Joint General Secretary World's Sunday School Association

Promoting the Family Altar

ONE of America's great needs is the introduction or revival of the family altar in every home. Because people are so very busy, they are robbing their children of their finest heritage, namely, the memory of their father's or mother's voice in prayer and in the reading of the Book.

One of America's biggest manufacturers, in whose home I have often visited, always makes time for the daily reading of the Bible in the family gathering, and prayer is offered, followed by the Lord's Prayer. All business stands aside for this.

What plans can be undertaken to increase the number of homes where family worship can be introduced?

1. The Home Departments of the country, with a million members, can introduce the family worship feature. The International Sunday School Association and all state, city and township associations provide two grades of Home Department membership. Grade B enlists any member who will give one half-hour weekly to the reading of the Bible lesson. Grade A adds to this requirement that family worship be held in the home, including at least the reading aloud of God's Word, and prayer. Home Department workers can procure from the International Sunday School Association or their state Association explanatory leaflet No. 2, "The Home Department and The Family Altar."

2. The Christian Herald offers for the months before us an unusual opportunity to introduce family worship in hundreds of thousands of homes. The new Bible Picture Study uses as its basis the International Bible Lesson and the Daily Bible Home Readings which are selected in connection with this International Lesson. These lessons and Daily Home Readings are bound by the Christian Herald in a booklet, which furnishes, in the most convenient form, the Bible material for the daily reading at family worship. Many families who use these Daily Home Readings for their family worship have to search the lesson quarterly for the daily indication of the passage, and then find the place in the Bible. This takes some time, and there are many instances where, because of lack of familiarity with the Bible, the passages would not be looked up. The Christian Herald booklet of the Daily Home Readings is therefore most valuable for Home Department and all readers.

After reading this passage each day, some one in the family could lead in prayer or the Lord's prayer could be uttered by all.

3. A church family altar campaign could be instituted to enlist every church family as observers of family worship. Just such a campaign was carried out in some Presbyteries in New York State with good results, the church elders calling with the pastor at the homes to secure pledges for the daily family altar.

4. One Sunday school issues a weekly card to its members, on which are suggested the Daily Home Readings for the week. Some one in the family is requested to read this lesson each day aloud in the home, and then a prayer is offered. Hundreds followed this plan. At the end of the year, the superintendent of that Sunday school offered a reward to all scholars who carried out the plan. You can be sure the parents got no rest until each day the Word was read aloud and prayer offered.

The Christian Herald Prayer League

ALL Christians are urged to unite with the members of the Prayer League in daily prayer at the noon hour. Also any one is at liberty to send a request for prayer or an acknowledgment of answered prayer, thereby becoming enrolled as a member of the Prayer League.

THE following program for the Week of Prayer, December 30, 1917–January 6, 1918, is suggested by the Federal Council of the Churches of Christ in America. The call to prayer is as follows:

"In the year now behind us, the whole civilized world has been solemnly called to learn in the school of God. The disciplines of life have been heavy upon us, but the light of the knowledge of the glory of God in the face of Jesus Christ has been upon the page as we scanned it. By that light we have learned much that may help us to face all that lies ahead.

"We have been forced to distrust our feeble measures of the power, the wisdom, and the love of God. We have been driven to question both the adequacy and the finality of our interpretation to the world of our Lord Jesus Christ. Non-Christian writers in the East have boldly challenged Christianity. The Holy Spirit is leading us through our failures, not only to a deeper search, but also to an earnest expectation of what other nations, more lately come under the influence of the Gospel, may realize in the risen, exalted and omnipotent Son of God.

"The things that are shaken are crumbling, and with them is being removed the veil that hides 'the city which hath foundations, whose builder and maker is God.' In this way the realities of life have proved the realities of faith; God and sin in eternal opposition; redemption and renewal the only way to peace; the Spirit of God upon the chaos our assurance that God is indeed 'within the shadow.'

"We are called anew to exercise the unspeakable privilege of prayer. The magnitudes of the time are so great that nothing human can compass them. God has pressed back into our trembling hands the supreme instrument of approach to himself.

"Did ever year open with a more clamant need for what is represented by the World's Evangelical Alliance? The Alliance mobilizes the faith of the world for common prayer, Christian unity, and cooperation. These are preludes to insight and vision, revival and new spiritual life, in preparation for the sure fulfilment of the promise of His coming 'whose Kingdom is an everlasting Kingdom, and whose dominion is from generation to generation.'"

The suggested topics for the days of the week are:

Sunday, December 30—"The Eternal Things." Dan. 4 : 3; II Cor. 4 : 18; Heb. 11 : 10, 12 : 27. Monday, December 31—Thanksgiving and Confession. Acts 17 : 24–28; Matt. 11 : 28–30; I Peter 11 : 21–25; I John 11 : 3–6; I Thes. 5 : 22. Tuesday, January 1—The Church Universal—The "One Body" of Which Christ is the Head. Eph. 11 : 13–22; Heb. 11 : 32–12; 2; Eph. 4 : 10–16; Mal. 3 : 10; Prov. 23 : 22–26; II Thes. 11 : 13–15; Matt. 28 : 18–20. Wednesday, January 2—Nations and Their Rulers. Prov. 14 : 34; 21 : 1; I Peter 4 : 19; II Peter 3 : 9; John 12 : 20–32; Isa. 11 : 2–4; I Cor. 4 : 1–5. Thursday, January 3—Families, Schools, Colleges, and the Young. Ps. 127; II Cor. 1 : 4; I Cor. 15 : 54–57; Matt. 18 : 1–6; Prov. 1 : 7, 9 : 10–12. Friday, January 4—Home Missions. Matt. 22 : 1–10; Prov. 22 : 1–2; James 2 : 1–9; Mal. 2 : 10; II Cor. 3 : 12–18. Saturday, January 5—Missions Among Moslems and Heathen. Dan. 2 : 34, 35, 45; 4 : 1–3; Isa. 60 : 1–8; Matt. 2 : 1–11; Eph. 4 : 4–6.

R. E. A. several months ago requested prayer that a long-lost brother might return. The prayer was granted, and now R. E. A. asks prayer for his conversion, and also for a younger brother, who is in deep trouble.

Mrs. K. S. praises God for the conversion of her son.

Mrs. M. K. believes in prayer with works. Her father, sixty years old and broken in health, forgave a poor woman a debt. Soon afterward a great and unexpected worldly good came to him in addition to the approval of his conscience. Miss M. K sends a beautiful interpretation of the Lord's Prayer, in which each petition is restated in terms of service.

Miss L. K. W. wrote to the Prayer League in behalf of her nephew, who was going under an operation for the fourth time. She thanks God that he is now better than the doctors expected, and prays that he may be an active Christian. She also prays for a brother, a church member, that he may take more interest in religion. Lastly she asks bodily healing for herself.

Prayers are asked for revivals of religion at:

Detroit, Mich.; Rochester, N. Y.; Louisville, Ohio (that many souls may be saved during revival and pastor and people blessed); Sauble, Mich. (for the success of evangelistic meeting); Hightstown, N. J. (for the success of revival now being held at the M. E. church); Lancaster, Pa. (that many may be saved during revival); Markesan, Wis. (for a revival of religion at Mackford Union Church); R. H., Edmeston, N. Y., that a pastor may be sent to the United Presbyterian Church.

Two parents ask prayer that their sons' minds may be restored; two wives, that husbands' minds may be restored; six friends, for mental restoration for themselves, relatives or friends.

Mrs. S. Z. asks prayer that son's sight may be restored; M. A. H., that husband's sight may be restored; eight friends, for restoration of sight for themselves, relatives or friends.

Seven friends ask prayer for restoration of hearing.

Five friends ask prayer for special blessings for others; including Mrs. J. B. P., that brother-in-law may be guided safely through the war; another, Mr. S. J. J., that son may return home safely after the war.

Twenty-one friends ask prayer for a deeper work of grace, assurance of sins forgiven, or express in other ways their desire for personal spiritual blessing.

Two parents ask prayer that their sons may be delivered from the liquor habit; Mrs. A. J. C. and C. G., that their brothers may be cured of the liquor habit; Mrs. F. Z., that a young man may be cured of the liquor habit.

Sixty-six friends ask prayer for the healing of friends or relatives, including F. F. W., that daughter may be fully restored to health and strength; another, Mrs. L. M. D., that son may pass safely through an operation and health be restored; another, E. A. B., that sister may be cured of tumors without an operation; thirty-one friends, for healing of self, including H. W. L., that use of limb may be restored.

Seventeen parents ask prayer for the conversion of sons; sixteen wives, their husbands; forty-five, other relatives and friends.

Twenty-two friends ask prayer for help or guidance in financial matters.

Nineteen friends ask prayer for the granting of various desires and needs, including J., that this terrible war may end and our boys may come home safely; another, Mrs. H. E. S., that grandson who is undersized and undeveloped may grow to the size of a normal boy of his age, also that granddaughter may be given the ability to speak plainly; another, Mrs. M. C. A., that she may be granted necessary support.

Acknowledgments of answered prayer have been received from the following:

A Reader, Schenectady, N. Y.; Mrs. H. E. S., Portland, Me.; E. J. W., Attleboro, Mass.; N. C. T., Woodbury, L. I.; A Subscriber, Knoxville, Tenn.; B. W. B., Orchid, Va.; C. L. F., Trenton, N. J.; J., St. Regis Falls, N. Y.; A. L., Rochester, N. Y.; A Subscriber, Hackensack, N. J.; Mrs. G. E., Bessville, Mo.

Young People's Topics for December 16

The Plague of Discontentment

Epworth League Topic. I Kings 21 : 1–5; Ps. 37 : 16; Prov. 16 : 8; I Tim. 6 : 6

HOW many times we are unhappy because of the "much goods" of somebody else! We often permit another man's fine house to dim our appreciation of our own comfortable home. Because we cannot give a thousand dollars, as he does, we lose the blessing of giving the five which our utmost sacrifice has not permitted us to exceed. We watch him speed by in his auto, and lose for the moment the joy of the pedestrian, and we forget to thank God for the sunshine and the fresh air and the exhilaration of the all-around physical blessing of a brisk walk. We do not know that the fine house may be but the shell of a discontented life, the thousand dollars may be a sop to a guilty conscience, and the speeding car a vain attempt to get away from a life becoming intolerable. Many a rich man doesn't like to remember how he got it. Better, indeed, is the poor man with a clear conscience and a heart void of offense. Better still the Christian who has won his wealth without any compromise of conscience. And better still is he who, whether poor or rich, is contented with what he has, and seeks only to find where he can render the utmost service with that which God has committed to his care—whose only discontent is a holy desire to discover new ways of service and to measure up fully to his opportunity.

Christ Our Peace. National Ideals—War or Peace

Isa. 9 : 6; Eph. 2 : 13–17

CHRIST is our peace. The world of today has almost forgotten the meaning of peace. Political peace and the peace of God are two different things. The peace that the world has known since Calvary has been much like the intervals of peace that preceded it: merely a time of preparation for further conflict. No matter what the condition of the world, the peace of God in the hearts of men transcends and illumines the strifes and calms of life. The man at the front, facing the shock of assaulting troops, or driving forward in an impetuous charge, may have the peace of God in his heart. His mind may be at rest and his soul ready for the sudden call. He fights as a citizen, he trusts as a Christian. Just now the world is torn by two conflicting national ideals; the one the ideal which seeks dominance, the other the ideal of democracy which seeks an equal opportunity for every man with justice and right enthroned. Until August, 1914, all nations had been tinged somewhat with the ideal of dominance; England was proud to be called the queen of the seas, Germany sought her "place in the sun," and the American fleet was known as the guardian of the Monroe Doctrine. Now we see how false are all ideals of dominance, and how necessary for the welfare of the race and for its future peace are the true ideals of democracy, of equal rights and of unfaltering justice. Out of this war must come a peace which will forever establish right as the superior of might in the world. From this will come a Christian peace; but even while the strife waxes more furious, the Peace of God may keep our hearts and minds through Christ, who is our Peace.

A Man's Book

WHAT to give the young man for Christmas is always a question hard to answer. Things he needs are too common and ordinary. For other things he cares little. Now and then a good book is written which can be added to the boy's store of gifts in full assurance that it will be prized. Such a book is "Their Call to Service," by Philip E. Howard, published by the Westminster Press, Philadelphia. It is a book of inspiration for the boy just on the threshold of manhood, facing a man's life with high purpose and a true heart. To such it will bring a final assurance that success lies in the path of service. It is a book of new ideals for the boy who may have been led to believe that the heights "by great men reached and kept" were climbed through devious paths and that true Christian living is foreign to the world of business. It tells simply and clearly of the way in which eleven men, some of them world figures in the field of industry, all of them masters of men and leaders in the secular and business worlds, made money and succeeded while serving God faithfully. The hearts of these lives of power beat in the pages of the little book, and no better gift could be given to a boy about to become a young man, or to a young man just entering business life.

The Holy City, the capture of which by the Allies from the Turks is impending

ARMIES BEFORE JERUSALEM

By ANTHONY ARNOUX

ALL Christendom is watching with eager interest the sweep of the world-war toward Palestine, which involves the fate of Jerusalem. The Holy City is once more confronted by armies bent on liberating it from the rule of the Turk. In the following article Mr. Arnoux describes with the accurate knowledge of a military expert, the situation up to the closing days of November, which may at any time reach a climax in the capture of the city.

THE British operations in Mesopotamia and Palestine, particularly the latter, are beginning to develop in a manner that is of absorbing interest to all Christians.

Both the Mesopotamian and Palestine operations are really separate parts of one great movement, the objective of which is the fusion of these parts into one whole at or near the city of Aleppo. This would mean the extension of British dominance over the whole of Turkey in Asia, south of the line of the Euphrates, and an extension of that line westward to the Mediterranean.

The achievement of this objective would undoubtedly seriously damage the political and military prestige of the Turkish Empire among all the peoples of the Near East. It would also greatly lessen the already considerably impaired authority of the Sultan of Turkey as supreme head of the Mohammedan religion, and would further have economic consequences of considerable importance. For instance, the capture of Aleppo and the surrounding country would deprive the Turks and their Teutonic Allies of the principal source of supply, within their own territories, of cotton. Moreover, if carried to full completion, this movement would conquer territories containing about 6,000,000 inhabitants, or about one-quarter of the entire population of the Turkish empire, and would thus directly enfeeble the military strength of that empire by making it impossible to draw on the males of that fraction of the population for military service.

IT must, however, be observed that many of these men of an age for military service even now are not available. Numbers of them have fled the Turkish dominions, while others on various grounds have evaded service, so that the weakening effect on the Turkish military man power is not fully in proportion to the numerical importance of the population affected.

These considerations give us some appreciation of the significance of the British operations as regards their offensive objectives. But they also have defensive objectives of almost equal importance which, even in their present incompleteness, these operations have achieved to a very great degree. The Sinai Peninsula lies southwest of Palestine, between the Holy Land and the Suez Canal and Egypt. The Suez Canal is an absolute necessity to the British empire as a means of speedy communication between Great Britain and her colonies in India, Australia and the Straits, as well as with the East generally. Napoleon said: "The heart of England is in Egypt; strike her there and she dies." Today this statement is even more true than it was a hundred years ago.

As we shall see when we review the operations on the Palestine front in more detail, the British now hold all the routes across the desert composing the Sinai Peninsula, as well as the gateways to these routes, the towns of Gaza, Halir el Auja and Marashash in southern Palestine. Their possession makes impossible any further attacks, such as were made by the Turks in the first two years of the war on the Suez Canal, and of course puts any Turkish invasion of Egypt completely out of the question.

We may consider briefly the details of the Mesopotamian campaign. From Bagdad, the present British headquarters in this campaign, the distance to Aleppo along the air line is about 450 miles. The northern boundary of Palestine proper is about 115 miles almost directly south of Aleppo, with Jerusalem about 200 miles farther to the south. Damascus in the Anti-Lebanon is in the neighborhood of 190 miles south of Aleppo, and about 450 miles directly east of Bagdad. But most of the distance between Damascus and Bagdad is embraced in the Syrian Desert, the northern extension of the Arabian Desert. This desert is a region impossible for European or even Turkish regular troops to live and operate in, and is sparsely populated by various tribes of nomadic Arabs. These Arabs have been for generations in chronic revolt of more or less acute character against Turkish authority, and in the present campign they have been secured, by promise or largess, by the British as allies.

North of this desert and at a distance varying from 40 to 100 miles therefrom, flows the Euphrates River, which practically all the way from Aleppo to Bagdad is navigable by small craft, thus forming an excellent line of communication along which the transports service of an army can be easily moved.

THE country between the Euphrates and the northern edge of the Syrian Desert for most of the distance between Bagdad and Aleppo is populated almost exclusively by the overflow of the Arabs of the desert, and these are also in alliance with Great Britain. Thus the line of British communications formed by the Euphrates is absolutely protected on the south. The northern banks of the river and the country stretching to the north for a good hundred and fifty miles, to the beginning of the mountains, are inhabited by races of Arabian descent, though not so pure as those to the south of the stream. But these semi-Arabs to the north are in full sympathy with Great Britain's expressed purpose of liberating all the Arab peoples from Turkish rule, and of founding an Arabian Empire embracing these and other territories under British suzerainty. Hence, these peoples will effectually guard the course of the Euphrates from attack from the north, once the British have forced their way along its banks.

On the river itself, the Turks have garrisons of regular troops at nearly all the important towns, such as Hit, Suvan, Rava, Deir, etc., but we have little knowledge as to their strength in rifles or artillery.

According to the latest news, the British army advancing westward, perhaps 120,000 strong, is somewhere between Ramadi and Hit, preparing to attack this last-named place. If captured, as it probably will be, the British at Hit will be about 350 miles east of Aleppo and 100 miles west of Bagdad. The danger to the British in this campaign is an attack by the Turks on Bagdad itself from the north. To guard against this, they have advanced some fifty miles northwest of the city along the Tigris, and established protecting fortified outposts. But as the Russian campaign in southwest Persia has completely collapsed and the Russians are everywhere in retreat northward, there is always the danger of a Turkish advance from the north or the northeast, as well as from the northwest. A Turkish attack from any of these directions would, if successful, place the British on the Euphrates River to the west of Bagdad in a dangerous position with foes in front and in the rear. The chances of such an attack being successful appear rather small. So much for the British movement from east to west, from Bagdad to Aleppo.

AS these last lines are written, the news arrived of the death by cholera of General Maude, the British commander-in-chief in these Mesopotamian operations. General Maude was a successful leader and a soldier of value. His death will be a serious loss to Great Britain; but his operations are so far advanced and so well developed that they can be continued by almost any good soldier.

Southern Palestine was very difficult for the British to reach. All the way from the Suez Canal, 100 miles to the east, their route of approach lay across the desert of the Sinai Peninsula, with its deep sands, its lack of water and its total absence of means of transportation more satisfactory than the camel. For months the British worked arduously to overcome these obstacles, at the same time fighting the Turks and driving them before them. The principal advance was made over the northerly of the three caravan routes which traverse the desert, the construction of a railroad keeping pace with the advance of the troops. Finally, after months of effort, during which several battles and numberless minor engagements were fought, the British reached El Arish, a place on the southern frontier of Palestine. This town captured, the advance was resumed with a rapidity which soon brought the English troops in front of Gaza, the principal gateway to Egypt. This place, however, was not reached until the heats of summer began. An attempt was then made to capture it, but this was not successful. Thereafter the British settled down to await the coming of cooler weather this autumn.

In the meantime, other British expeditions had crossed the Sinai peninsula by the two other caravan routes farther to the east, and had also reached the borders of Palestine, the one following the central route capturing Haur el Audja, and connecting itself with the British lines to the southeast of Gaza. Thus the British stood on a front beginning at Gaza and running slightly southeast for a distance of about forty-five miles. With the coming of cooler weather this autumn, General Allenby started a fresh advance. He first swung his right wing nortward and, after some severe fighting, captured Beersheba, that ancient city so often mentioned in the Old Testament. This operation brought the British right wing to a level with their left wing and center, so that their line now ran almost due east and west.

IT was now the turn of the British left to strike, and this it did with such purpose that the town of Gaza was captured, and with it 3,000 Turks and a considerable quantity of artillery. Not content with this success, and aided by the British fleet which bombarded the Turkish positions in front of their army, this wing continued its course northward, capturing in the short space of a fortnight all the towns on or near the coast as far north as Jaffa, the ancient Joppa. Jaffa itself was entered on November 19, and with the place the British gained control of the railway running from this port eastward to the Holy City, Jerusalem. By this move Jerusalem was outflanked to the northwest.

The British center during this time had also worked its way northward, along the crest of the ridge of mountains which run north and south between the sea and the valley which runs north from Beersheba toward Jerusalem, while the right wing had also moved up this valley. Both of these advances, however, were accomplished at the cost of severe fighting, in which the casualties on both sides appear to have been unusually heavy. General Allenby is probably at the head of from 75,000 to 80,000 men, but we have no accurate knowledge of the strength of the Turkish forces opposing him.

Everywhere the British are now treading on sacred and historic ground, and their eyes rest on scenes once well known even to Christ himself. At the time these words are written, the British center had reached a position about eighteen miles to the southwest of Jerusalem, while their left wing had pushed forward to a point only ten miles or so due south and southeast of the city. The resistance of the Turks is reported to be growing feebler, but is hardly to be expected that they will abandon Jerusalem without a struggle, since the town occupies a strategic position of some importance. On the other hand, with the city practically encircled by the British troops, inspired as they no doubt are by the sacred associations of the place, there seems little doubt that the dream of Christendom, for the past thousand years, is at last about to be realized and that the Cross will replace the crescent as the guardian of the sepulcher of our Lord.

On November 28 and 29 the news came that the Turks had succeeded in concentrating reserves and guns on the Jerusalem front and had stopped the British advance, temporarily at least. It is understood that the British will bring up fresh troops with additional guns, ammunition and supplies before definitely moving against the city.

Jerusalem once being taken, the next point at which the British will strike will presumably be Damascus and the railroad connecting that city with the coast at Haifa. Then, following along the railroad connecting Damascus and Aleppo, Homs and Hamah could be successively aimed at, and finally Aleppo itself. But it may be doubted whether the British will be able to accomplish the full development of this plan of campaign before the spring puts an end to their military activity for this season, and it may further be doubted whether their army now operating on the Palestine front will be strong enough numerically, without very large reinforcements, to attain their main objective.

A WEEK IN THE WORLD'S NEWS

LORD LANSDOWNE FOR PEACE. The Marquis of Lansdowne, Foreign Minister to the Cabinets of Lord Salisbury and Mr. Balfour, Minister without portfolio in Mr. Asquith's Coalition Ministry, and who has been Viceroy of India and Governor General of Canada, has startled England with a public letter urging upon the Allies a restatement, in general terms, of their war aims, in an attempt to bring about peace before "the prolongation of the war leads to the ruin of the civilized world."

"We are now," he writes, "in the fourth year of the most dreadful war the world has ever known—a war in which, Sir W. Robertson lately informed us, the number of the killed alone can be counted by the million, while the total number of men engaged amounts to nearly 24,000,000.

"Those who look forward with horror to the prolongation of the war, who believe that its wanton prolongation would be a crime differing only in degree from that of the criminals who provoked it, may be excused if they scan the horizon anxiously in the hope of discovering indications that the outlook may, after all, not be so hopeless as is supposed."

Lord Lansdowne puts his suggestions in definite form: "An immense stimulus would probably be given to the peace party in Germany if it were understood (1) that we do not desire the annihilation of Germany as a great power; (2) that we do not seek to impose upon her people any form of government other than that of their own choice; (3) that, except as a legitimate war measure, we have no desire to deny to Germany her place among the great commercial communities of the world; (4) that we are prepared, when the war is over, to examine, in concert with other powers, a group of international problems, some of them of recent origin, which are connected with the question of the freedom of the seas; (5) that we are prepared to enter into an international pact, under which ample opportunities would be afforded for the settlement of international disputes by peaceful means.

"I am under the impression that authority could be found for most of these propositions in ministerial speeches. If it be once established that there are no insurmountable difficulties in the way of agreement upon these points, the political horizon might perhaps be scanned with better hope by those who pray, but can at this moment hardly venture to expect, that the new year may bring us a lasting and honorable peace."

SEQUESTRATING ALIEN PROPERTY. Money and property of Germans subject to sequestration within the United States will exceed $600,000,000 and may reach a billion. Property or money owned by Germans living abroad was to have been reported to the Alien Property Custodian by December 5, after which date it would be taken over by the Government. About 450 persons are busy taking care of all this wealth.

SOLDIERS GUARD PIERS. Armed soldiers began to patrol piers in New York and Brooklyn on November 28. A census of all persons, enemy and other, within 300 feet of a pier was taken by the United States marshal and the police. The troops are housed and fed on the piers, and the entire water-front is to form a military zone.

TO LIMIT KICK IN BEER. President Wilson has approved a reduction in the alcoholic content of beer to three per cent. Mr. Hoover allows the manufacture of beer in order that the drinkers of the nation shall not be placed on a whisky diet. Otherwise he would prohibit the manufacture of beer and save all the grain.

NEWS PRINT MEN TO LIMIT PRICES. War prices for news print paper have been agreed to by the manufacturers, after four of them had been heavily fined for violation of the Anti-Trust Act. The Government is to fix maximum prices and to dissolve the "Paper Trust." It is estimated that this will save the publishers an increase of thirty to forty million dollars next year. The maximum price in rolls is to be $3 per 100 pounds at the mills; in sheets and less than carload lots, $3.25 to $3.75 per 100 pounds.

CHIEF CHARITY GRAFTER CAUGHT. George F. Sweeney, an advertising solicitor, who got the biggest sum from the Army and Navy Bazaar in New York, was indicted on November 27 for forgery. The soldiers and sailors got about $1 out of every $100 collected by the bazaar. While the indictment was being drawn up, the Aldermen of New York passed an ordinance requiring all fairs, bazaars and other charity entertainments to obtain licenses and make reports to the proper authorities.

HUNGER STRIKERS RELEASED. Twenty-two suffragists, who had been imprisoned at Washington and refused to be fed, were released on November 27. The liberated prisoners were taken away in automobiles, most of them being too weak to get into the cars without help. The demonstration for which the suffragists were imprisoned was organized for the purpose of calling attention to the demand for a suffrage amendment to the Federal Constitution. The next day the last of the prisoners was released.

TWO TORPEDOES FIND THEIR MARK. The American steamship Actæon, the first of the German steamers seized by the American Government, was sunk by a torpedo off the Spanish coast. Twenty-one of her crew of fifty-eight, thirty-one of whom were Americans, were landed at Port Camarinas in northwestern Spain. Word was received in Baltimore on November 27 of the destruction by a submarine of the new American schooner Margaret Roberts, which was bound for the Canary Islands with a cargo of grain. It was believed that the captain and crew were landed safely. The schooner was on her second trip.

A MURDER TRUST. Ten men were arrested in a city-wide round-up in New York on November 27 after Ralph Daniello confessed to the knowledge of twenty-three hitherto unsolved murder mysteries. Three bands controlled the gambling-houses in the Italian quarters, and ordered the death of all who refused to pay tribute. Ten bosses were at the head of three gangs, which avenged with death the invasion of their respective territories. "We have merely scratched the surface," said Assistant District Attorney Renaud. More than a score of murders were revealed by the confession of Daniello.

FAMOUS RAIDER GONE. Dr. Jameson, author of the famous Jameson raid which preceded the Boer War, and later premier of Cape Colony, died recently.

THE WORLD'S CROPS. The International Institute of Agriculture at Rome estimates the crops of the world as follows: Corn, 3,312,000,000 bushels, or 14.1 per cent. over five-year average; oats, 2,680,000,000 bushels, or 13.9 per cent. over five-year average; wheat, 15 per cent below average; rye, 8 per cent. below average; rice, full average crop; potatoes, full average; barley, 4 per cent. below average. The deficiency is in wheat, rye and barley, the chief food grains of the fighting nations. In England, France and Italy 455,000,000 bushels of wheat alone will be needed to make up the shortage which must be filled from the not overfull crops of America, Asia and Australia, in which countries the most rigid economy, together with intensive and extensive agriculture, must be practiced.

GERMANY OFFERS PEACE TO RUSSIA. Count George F. von Hertling, the new Imperial German Chancellor, told the Reichstag when it reassembled that he was ready to enter into peace negotiations as soon as the Russian Government sent representatives having full powers to Berlin.

"I hope and wish," he said, "that these efforts will soon take definite shape and bring us peace."

Respecting Poland, Lithuania, and Courland, Count von Hertling said: "We respect the right of self-determination of their peoples. We expect they will give themselves a constitutional form of government corresponding to their conditions."

FOR GREATER UNITY OF THE ALLIES. The Inter-Allied Conference Committees went into session at Versailles on December 1. The American members were pleased with the cordial manner of their reception. Premier Lloyd George and General Wilson speak for Great Britain, Premier Clemenceau and General Foch for France, Premier Orlando and General Cadorna for Italy, and Colonel House and General Bliss for the United States.

Progress of the War

BY ANTHONY ARNOUX

THE first war conference of the Allies, under the agreement recently made between them, began at Paris on November 29. On the same day the conference between the sovereigns of the three Scandinavian countries, Norway, Sweden and Denmark, as well as the prime ministers of those countries, began at Christiania. Among the questions to be taken up at this conference is the food embargo.

The Lenine government of Russia has entered into direct negotiations with Germany, looking to an immediate armistice for three months, during which time the terms of a peace treaty between the two countries are to be settled. Germany has given official consent to the beginning of negotiations. Two of the Russian armies, the second and the fifth, have pledged themselves to support the Lenine government by arms, if necessary in its program. What attitude has been taken by the other armies is not known. Various reports concerning the organization of other rival governments to the Lenine are in circulation. Even if the Lenine government is sufficiently established to be recognized as responsible by the Teutons, it does not follow that the present negotiations will result in any agreement, or be followed by a formal peace. The object of the Lenine government is not so much to make peace with Germany, as to induce a social revolution in all the countries of the world, and these peace negotiations are only a means to that end. Consequently, terms and conditions will very possibly be suggested by the Lenine government, predicated on a new order of things in the world, which it will be impossible for Germany or any other existing government to accept. The Allies have refused to recognize the Lenine government as the Russian government.

The U-boat sinkings of British merchantmen increased during the week ending November 25, 14 vessels of over 1,600 and 7 of less tonnage having been sunk.

On the Italian battle-line, while there was very severe and continued fighting in the mountains between Asiago and Quero, on the Piave River during the whole week, the relative positions of the antagonists changed but little. On the Piave front itself, from Quero to the Adriatic, the activity was confined to more or less violent artillery duels. On the whole of this front, the week may be called a stalemate, as far as active military operations are concerned. British and French troops in considerable numbers reached the fighting front toward the end of the week.

The French portion of the western front, except for a thrust on the north front of Verdun which gained a little ground and in which some 800 prisoners were captured, has been relatively calm all the week. On the British portion of this front the principal fighting has been in the sector immediately west of Cambrai. Here for days an intense struggle has been going on for the possession of Bourlon village and the wood of that name, and for a crossroad hamlet, called Fontaine Notre Dame. These places are about three miles west of Cambrai. These villages have been won and lost more than half a dozen times during the week. In the end the British were driven out of both villages but still held on to portions of the wood. The struggle is still proceeding.

CHAPTER I

"LETTER for you," said a young man seated at a small desk in one corner of a small room, as another young man came briskly in and closed the door with a sharp swing, stopping it just in time to prevent it from banging.

With the same wide-awake, alert, but not noisy quickness he stepped across the room and took the letter out of a little pasteboard box nailed on a closet door, sat down at a table in the opposite corner of the room where the other young man was seated, and opening the letter read it without any expression except that of sustained wide-awakeness.

Looking up at the end of the letter, he glanced over at the other young man and nodded as if in answer to a spoken question.

"Yes, another one from Red Hill. Looks as if they really wanted me out there."

"That makes three you have had, besides two from the superintendent. It does look as if they were short of material. Have they ever heard you preach?"

"No. I've never been in Kansas. Never west of the Ohio. But I've about made up my mind to go."

"No!" The other young man suddenly rose and came over and sat down on one end of the table by which the speaker was seated. "You don't mean it, do you, Howard?"

"Yes, I do, Roy. I've always wanted to go West and begin my ministry out there. It's new and full of possibility. There has always been something fascinating and alluring about the West. There is more room than there is here."

"Yes, there's not much room in little old New York. I've about made up my mind to decline every call I get to any church between the Bowery and Three hundred and Seventy-fifth Street. But you're cut out for a big church. And a city church. And here you are planning to go out to a little country town in Kansas and bury yourself in a place called Red Hill. 'Red,' I suppose, because there never was any 'red' there, and 'Hill' because it's flatter than usual."

"I've never seen a picture of the spot, Roy. But I don't care about that. I've about made up my mind to go. And there's another reason—" his wide-awake, absolutely sleepless face grew just a shadow more thoughtful—"there's Rose. She needs a change. The doctor says the climate out there ought to be good for her. And she seems rather eager to go——"

"How is your sister?" his roommate asked gently, as if the question was an old one, the answer to which always conveyed a story of a home tragedy.

"She is some better, But since father's death she has been alone. We're the only ones left. She will be able to keep house for me out there."

"Howard, you ought to have a wife. You've promised to stay and see Kate and me married. I don't ever expect to get a call to any church. But I'm going to have a wife anyhow. That much I'm sure of."

"I can see Kate and you settled over an ideal parish. She will straighten out your theology and your confused habits generally. But I've never seen any one I dare ask to be a minister's wife."

"You'll probably meet her at Red Hill," said Roy Lennox laughing. They both laughed.

IF they had been able to see five years into the future they would not have laughed. I wonder what they would have done. What would any of us do if we could raise the curtain on five years from now? It would be a look at divinely hidden scenes, mercifully shut out of our human history.

"How about this Red Hill, Howard? What sort of a place is it, anyhow?"

"The superintendent has written quite fully. He says it's an average Kansas town. Seven hundred people. Mostly American. A sprinkling of German, Swedish and Norwegian farmers outside. One main street for business. A high school. A country courthouse. And four churches, Methodist, Presbyterian, Baptist and Congregational."

"That simplifies matters some," said Lennox gravely.

"What does? Simplifies what?"

"Why, there are only four churches. There might be five or six."

"I won't try to run but one, Roy. That will keep me busy."

"Four is in seven hundred one hundred and seventy-five times. If everybody in Red Hill should to go church on Sunday you would have a fair audience. I don't believe I could get that many people to come and hear me preach more than once."

"I'm not worrying over that," Howard replied. "If the other churches can get more people than ours it will be my fault."

"You haven't said anything about the salary. What will they pay?"

"Let's see." Howard looked over a pile of letters on the table and opened two or three. "Oh, yes. Here it is. The superintendent says they are willing to give $900 and use of parsonage. It seems the church has just gone to self-support and they find it rather hard to raise the amount. But he thinks they can do it if the right man is secured."

"How did the superintendent happen to pick on you as the right man?"

"He was a classmate of my father in the seminary. In his letters, you remember, he says he has always taken a great interest in me, and thinks I would fit in at Red Hill. He says the people want a young man. I happen to fit that requirement. They also want a young man of energy. The last man they had lacked aggressiveness and lost out to the other churches. The superintendent has assured them I am energetic, and they are willing to take his word for it."

"I can give them a recommend along that line, Howard. You have the most wide-awake face I ever saw. You don't look sleepy at any time. I don't know what you sleep for, anyhow. I never saw you look tired."

"My father always had the same look. It goes with all the Chase family. I can't help it."

"Don't try to. It is a great card with strangers. The first thing the people of Red Hill will say when they see you will be, 'Well, he's a wide-awake looking young fellow. I'll bet he was born in Kansas all right. He wasn't raised in New York or New Jersey.'"

HOWARD CHASE laughed. And when he laughed his expressive face fairly radiated life. It took on the glow of a good portrait suddenly illuminated by a beam of sunlight streaming into an old gallery through a rich stained-glass window.

"What other qualifications do they want at Red Hill besides youth and energy? Any brains mentioned?"

"Yes. The superintendent says they want a young man of keen intellectual grasp. Some one who is not afraid of study and can keep up with the best thought.'

"All for nine hundred dollars," said Roy gravely.

"And at the same time," Howard grinned, "they want a conservatively spiritually minded preacher who will not chase after every new fad in religion or run head-on collisions in theology. Kansas people are progressive conservatives when it comes to religion."

"What are some of the other qualifications besides youth, energy, brains and religion?"

"Why, according to the superintendent they want a college graduate, and if he can play the organ and lead the music it will be a great help, but the last isn't abolutely necessary."

"Lucky for you since you don't know the 'Hallelujah Chorus' from 'John Brown's Body.' What else do the friends in Red Hill like?"

"They want some one who is popular with young people and a good administrator, and if possible keep up the finances."

"You can do that all right. Any man who can board and clothe and room himself and get an education on three hundred dollars a year without any visible means of support like you during the time I've known you is a professional financier. You can qualify on that point."

"Yes," said Howard, grinning again with a sense of humor that was going to save him in moments of deepest tragedy. "They can borrow money off me on nine hundred dollars a year if they really pay it. But the superintendent mentions another thing that I'm not so sure of"

"What's that?"

"He says any one who goes into that field will have to compete at present with three other men, all of whom are hustlers and fairly good preachers and administrators."

"I thought you said a minute ago that if the other churches got more people than yours if would be your fault."

"And it will. Maybe I can prevent it. But I don't feel sure on that point. Somehow it seems humiliating to go proselyting around among other ministers' folds in order to fill up your own. I don't believe I can do that. The only thing I can do is to make my church services and program so interesting that the people will choose my church instead of the others."

"If you succeed, the result on the other churches will be the same as if you went into their folds and stole their pet lambs by night, won't it?"

"I suppose it will. But what would you have me do? Less than my level best? If I can get the people of Red Hill to come to the Congregational Church instead of the Methodist, Presbyterian or Baptist they won't lose anything. They will be getting progressively conservative religion. But I can't toady to people, and I won't ask anybody to come to my church instead of the others. I've got to make it more worth their while to come to me than to the others."

"I can see grass growing over the walks leading up to the M. E., Presbyterian and Baptist churches already, Howard. There isn't one of those preachers can hold a candle to you on good looks and blarney generally. The young folks will come over to you in a body. The yellow-legged chickens will fall on their backs when you make your calls and are invited to stay to dinner. Flowers will adorn your pulpit. Slippers will grace your Christmas trees. And the local editor will print Monday morning extracts from your sermon. 'See the conquering hero comes' will resound up and down the one business street of Red Hill when you make your daily triumphant pilgrimage up and down it from the corner grocery to the post-office and back. And then after a romantic marriage with the fair daughter of your senior deacon, who has fallen in love with you at sight, in a rosy cloud I see you buying a ticket to a metropolitan pulpit that has extended a call to——"

"Stop! I won't listen to your prophecies any longer. At the same time, I don't see how I'm to blame if I use any and every talent I possess to win the populace of Red Hill to my church. And yet, somehow, as I started to say when you interrupted with your blarney, I don't believe I can or will do some of the things the Red Hill people will probably want me to do in the matter of aggressiveness."

"No. You're such a mild, meek fellow! I'm sorry, though, for the other ministers in Red Hill. They will be ringing their tocsins after you have been there a month. Kate and I are going out to California for our wedding trip. I am tempted to stop over on our way back and visit Red Hill just to see the havoc you have wrought in the M. E., Presbyterian and Baptist fortifications."

"Ah! That's the only sensible thing you've said this morning. You're specially invited right now. I'll ask Rose to make one of your favorite three-story apple pies. And I'll take pleasure in introducing you to the fair daughter of the senior deacon whom you mentioned so flippantly a minute ago."

"Accepted. Get your best room ready. Will wire you from Los Angeles. By the way, what railroad is Red Hill on?"

"On the main line of the Santa Fe."

"Then we can find it all right. Be down to meet us so we won't get lost in the population."

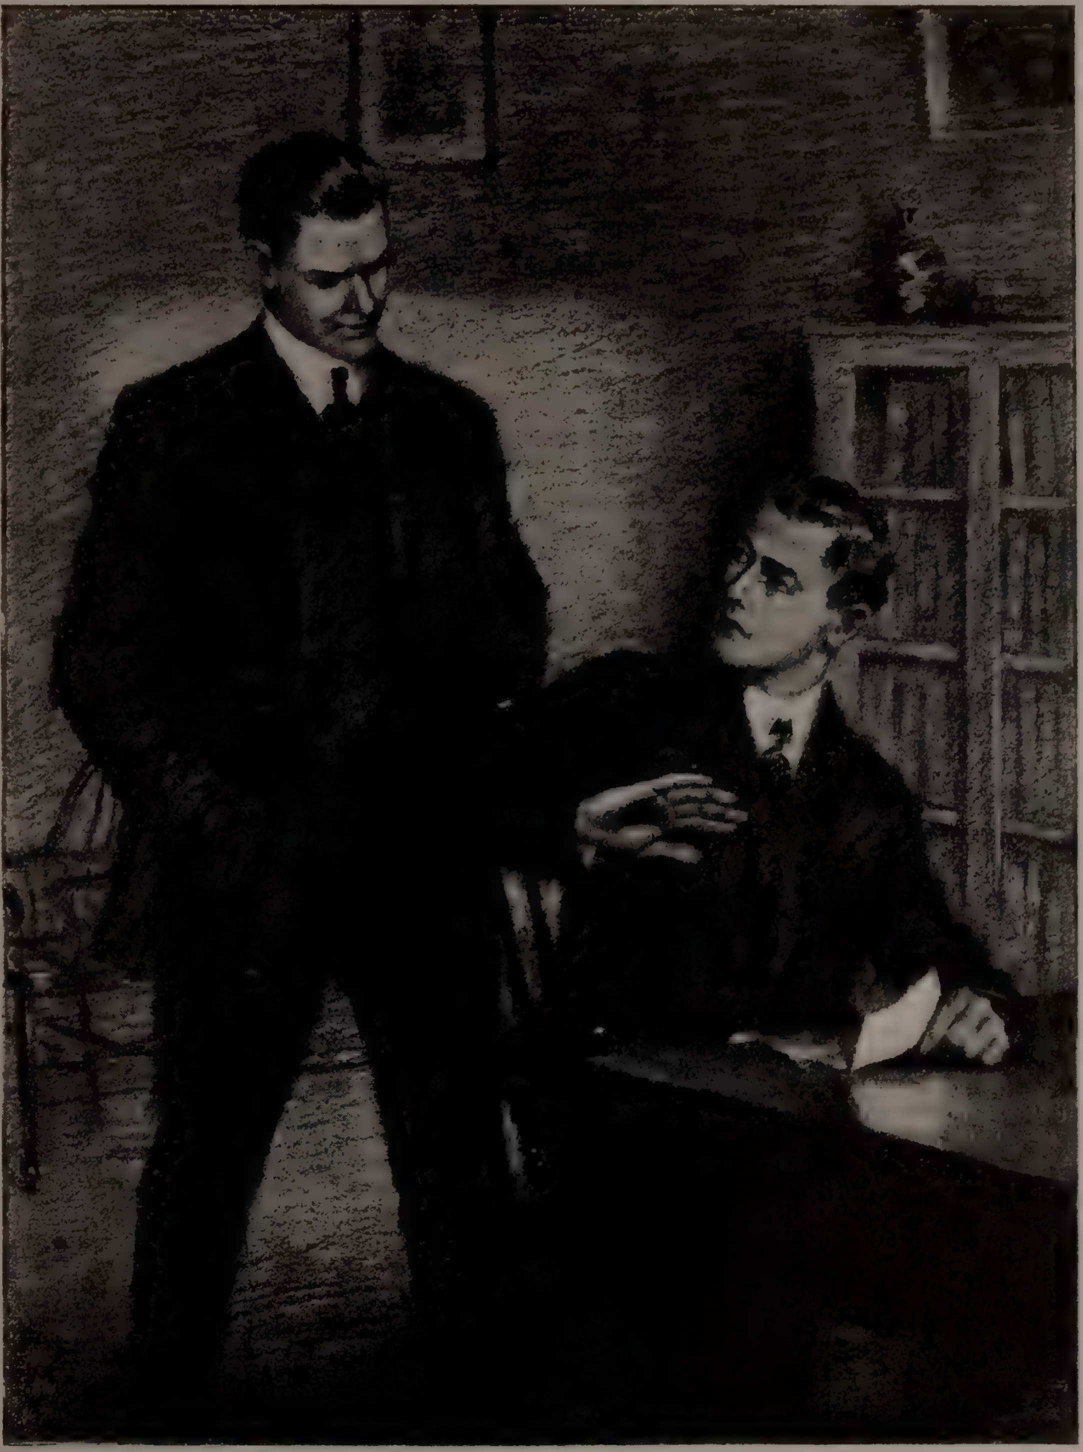
Lennox went back to his table and the two friends lapsed into the silence which perfect friends so happily understand. We will break that silence long enough to tell you a little about them.

ROY LENNOX was that rara avis, a rich theologue. His father was a retired business man living in New York, and Roy after college at Yale had chosen the ministry for his life-work and gone on to Union Seminary.

Instead of living at home he had preferred to be at the seminary buildings and there had met Howard Chase, who had entered the seminary the same year. They had gone in as roommates and during the three years' course there had grown up one of those deep, lifelong attachments that are the glory of young men.

Roy Lennox had chosen the ministry. He had no liking for a business career, which was a great disappointment to his father, who had never known anything else. He did not care for medicine, law, journalism, art, music or science. His father's means were so ample, and his father so indulgent towards him, that he had never learned a trade or distinguished himself in college or anywhere else for anything in particular. He had taken the seminary course in a perfunctory way, occasionally illuminated with exceptional spurts of enthusiasm pumped into him by his chum, but he was near the end of the course, as he himself had said, with no expectation of a call to any church that cared for him enough to ask him to be its pastor. He was going to marry, immediately after graduating, a young woman he had known ever since he was a boy, the daughter of one of his father's partners, a young woman born to luxury but with more positive and clear-cut definitions of life in general than Lennox himself ever had known, who if he had defined himself would have said:

"I am a young man of good habits, respectable parentage, and an assured income, which I have never earned; a lover of rather expensive and numerous things; willing to be the minister of any fairly well-to-do church where things are not too strenuous, in which I will do the regular work of a minister with no particular passion, but with perfect propriety, my wife gracing all necessary occasions with good looks, fine taste in dress, and ability to preside at the necessary meetings and do the social deeds that go with her position. In other words, I am a harmless individual if I once break into the pastorate, and I have only one really great passion, and that is my admiration for and faith in my roommate and classmate, Howard Chase. He is a real minister, and I will do anything in my power, if he will let me, to back up any plans he has to work out for the reform of the world and the general amelioration of mankind."



"Stop! I won't listen to your prophecies any longer"

IN speaking thus of his classmate, Lennox unconsciously revealed the noblest trait he himself possessed. For the enthusiasm he acknowledged he himself never felt for his own calling so far as he was called, he did have for Howard Chase, whom he exalted into a position of almost semi-divinity, worthy of more than deepest respect, rising at times into a feeling bordering on real worship.

It was the eternal story of attraction of opposites.

Howard Chase had every quality that Roy Lennox lacked. He was called to the ministry with a divine call that was absolutely unmistakable. It was a trumpet call to action, clear, ringing, insistent. It resounded in accents that were staccato, "woe is me if I preach not." He never had a doubt as to the miraculous, superhuman, eternal person of Jesus Christ and the facts of his earthly story and their application to daily life. He was ready to go anywhere and preach to anybody. The matter of salary was so minute an item that he never thought to mention it to Lennox when he received his first letter from the Kansas superintendent, and actually had to refer to previous letters before he could recall the exact amount.

In physical person Chase was a perfect animal, an athlete of renown in his own college, where he had broken the record for the running broad jump, the 440-yard dash, the hurdles, the hammer-throw and the quickest tennis play. He was always in training, lithe as a panther, with a profile like Antinous, or better, like Apollo Belvidere.

WITH all this physical endowment he carried a finely strung spiritual sensitiveness, so keen and delicate it seemed at times all feminine. And then, without any warning, right across that delicate harp of prophet insight and vision would sweep a hand so primitive, so masculine, with almost coarse and egotistic assumption of power, that all the finer things seemed to snap and go at ragged ends, and Lennox many a time gasped at the sight and wondered if his ideal of Chase was destroyed. But it never was, and the growing conviction of Lennox after three years' intimate acquaintance only deepened his faith in Howard Chase as an absolutely true, pure, wonderfully endowed soul, something cleaved off of divine beginnings, but never for one moment renouncing its earth-born nature.

Chase and Lennox were also at opposite ends of the economic scale. Lennox had money and spent it freely. Chase counted every nickel and performed miracles of economy with his laundry, board and books. Once, after only a few weeks of first acquaintance, Lennox offered to loan Chase a few dollars. He never made such an offer again. Something in Chase's refusal seared him so that when he found himself alone he felt of himself as if Chase had struck him somewhere. Chase earned money by giving athletic lessons in a Y. M. C. A. gymnasium downtown. Once Lennox went with him to a night exhibition in which Chase did the giant swing, and in a boxing contest knocked a Y. M. C. A. member up against a parallel bar standard so hard that he fell down and fainted away.

Chase was kneeling over him in a flash, doing the first right thing, and when the young fellow came to and smiled faintly Lennox heard Chase say:

"I was an ass to hit you so hard." And in reply came faintly, and Chase's familiar grin responded to it:

"First time I was ever kicked by a mule."

The vivid impression of the evening that Lennox carried away was the impression of reserve, not expended power, a power that leaped and bounded up hill with leopard strides, relentless when it struck, but just as pitiful and sacrificial when the victim fell as if nothing would atone for the suffering but life itself.

A word about Chase's family life.

It had been nothing short of a succession of tragedies, beginning with the sudden death of his mother when he was a child, succeeded by the crippling of an older brother through a fall and his later death. Then came one of the saddest strokes of all to the family when the young man to whom his sister Rose was engaged committed a business crime and was sentenced to a five-year term in the penitentiary.

The shock of it nearly unbalanced the girl's reason, and under the fiery branding of it she grew old, and at one time Howard was afraid she would become bitter and even lose her Christian faith. But they were both spared that trouble, and Rose had finally accepted her experience as her brother had prayed she might, and turned her strong affectionate impulse toward the care of her father, who had gradually given way in health under this succession of troubles, and had died only a few weeks before this history begins, leaving Howard and his sister the only survivors of a family that had once seemed to promise every hope of a long and happy history.

Roy Lennox came over again to his roommate's table. Howard had just finished a letter. He held it up as Lennox looked at him questioningly.

"Yes, it's done. I've written the superintendent that I'll accept the call to Red Hill and begin work there in May, right after the General Conference."

Lennox looked at him wistfully.

"I wish I had a field of some sort. Do you suppose they could keep two men busy? I'd be willing to go out as your assistant and work for nothing. Kate and I could help you undermine the M. E., Presbyterian and Baptist strongholds. I am not much of an underminer myself, but Kate is an expert. You can see what she has done to me."

"Roy, if the smallest church out West hasn't got enough for two men to do it hasn't got enough for one. That's one of my hobbies, you know. But you're mistaken if you think I'm going to undermine any one. I'm going to build up."

"But how can you build up without undermining? If there are only seven hundred souls in Red Hill divided among four churches I don't understand how you can make your church stronger without making theirs weaker. Unless you draw your support from Kansas City or Topeka."

"Of course. I—" Howard began, and then stopped. His characteristic grin faded out. The lines of his mouth hardened into straighter meaning. His great eyes seemed to fill with black pigment that flowed over the surface like a color actually applied by some force behind the screen.

"Roy, I'm going out to Red Hill to preach Jesus Christ and him crucified. I'm going to get all the souls I can to preach to and work for. That is going to be my main business. If in doing it anything happens to the other religious organizations I shall not feel responsible. Let them look after themselves. My program is as clear as the noonday sun."

"I know it is," said Lennox for the first time that morning letting his real feeling for Chase appear. "And when I said I wished I could be your assistant I wasn't talking lightly. I would count it the greatest thing in my life if I could be with you, and you know it."

"Of course I do."

Howard got up and leaned over his table, putting his hands on Roy's shoulders. "And I don't know any one I would rather have. I've prayed every day for a year that the Lord would bless you by taking your money away. If you and Kate had to go into some needy missionary field and work for about nothing and board yourselves it would be the making of you both. But even as it is, if I can persuade the trustees at Red Hill to take you on my recommendation——"

Jesus and Jerusalem

WHILE the campaign in Palestine, which seems to have almost reached the culminating point, is only one of the issues involved in the world-war, to the Christians of many lands it is one of the crowning issues and full of the deepest significance. They see in it the approaching fulfilment of mighty events, foretold by the prophets and emphasized by Jesus during his earthly ministry. They have followed with keen interest the rising wave of conquest as it swept over the Turkish strongholds in steady succession. They have watched its progress as it passed through the Edenic country and along the Euphrates, and as it came up from Egypt and the Sinaitic peninsula and across the desert, enveloping in its path many of the old Biblical places, Gaza, Beersheba, Askelon, Ashdod, Timnath, Ekron, Lydda, and others, including the territory between the lower Jordan and the sea, and finally reaching Joppa, where the lines of invasion curved around until at last they faced Jerusalem. We can picture in imagination that city, once "the joy of the whole earth," surrounded by armies, with tents spread on the encircling hills and valleys, every foot of whose ground is associated with sacred memories. Jerusalem, subjected to the devastation of a bombardment, would shock the civilized world; but the processes of modern warfare are inexorable.

"When thou seest Jerusalem encompassed with armies, then know that the desolation thereof is nigh." Such was the warning given by the world's Redeemer two thousand years ago. Many times has the venerable city been the prey of warring hosts. Its hills and valleys have echoed the battle-shouts of those who were gathered for its destruction, and its people have fled before their enemies. Many Christmases have passed since these words were spoken. The great heart of the Christian world goes out to Jerusalem in this new ordeal, in the hope that the day of her restoration may be near at hand.

For the Church to Consider

ONE of the great lessons the world is learning through the war is the value of mobilization and coordinated effort. Never has the power of unity been so convincingly demonstrated as we find it today. In finance, in mechanics, in all the various branches of production and manufacture that are part of our nation's industrial life, the order of the day is mobilization and coordination for efficiency's sake. Individualism is forgotten and the interests of communities and states are set aside in order that the great emergency may be met by a united nation, with one ideal in common, the realization of which would justify all sacrifices. In such an emergency, a disunited people, split into many factions and swayed and tossed by conflicting interests, could hope to accomplish nothing.

Cannot the Church see the analogy in the light of the present crisis? We find it hesitating between union and division, between the mobilization of its forces for victory or the retention of individualism, factions, jarring creeds, ecclesiastical rivalries, all of which spell inefficiency and disaster. Is it not time that the Church of Christ laid aside its weights and incumbrances, and stood forth with a united front for the task that lies before it? If the state and nation can win only through the subordination of all minor interests—if such a sweeping choice be willingly made in material things—how can the Church of Christ, with a supreme spiritual object in view, hesitate to mobilize and concentrate all its forces for the successful presentation of Jesus Christ as the Saviour of the world? There is common ground in Christianity for all the denominations to work together for the Kingdom. The multitudes are seeking after God; they are ready for a spiritual movement which, conducted by a united and harmonious Church, would sweep millions into the Kingdom.

We believe that after the war there should be, and will be, a new world—never again the same as the old—a world with new visions, new hopes, nobler ideals; a world whose soul has been reawakened, and which is ready to listen to the counsel of earnest, consecrated leaders and to follow such leadership.

Some time the war must end, and then the work of material rehabilitation will begin. The time for the Church to organize its great task of spiritual rehabilitation is now. Her leaders in this work must be ready "to bear witness to her Lord with a new power." Pentecostal endowment will come only if the Church is in the attitude to receive it. It must empty itself of all distractions, jealousies, mere worldly ambitions, and be ready to be spirit-filled. Then, indeed, when the moment comes, it can go out against the hosts of sin, victorious and to conquer.

Kiss or Cup of Gold ?

WHEN King Cyrus gave to Artabazus a cup of gold, while to Chrysanthis, his favorite, he gave only a kiss, Artabazus complained, "Sire, the cup you give me is not so good gold as the kiss you give Chrysanthis."

This was in the days of old, but human nature has not much changed, and many an Artabazus still longs for some simple token of love and is mocked with a costly bauble that means nothing; with the golden but empty cup in hand the soul still goes athirst.

If there is any day in the year when the greed for gold should be stifled and shut out and place made in the heart for better, dearer, sweeter things, that day is Christmas; and there are many people in the world who can derive more real happiness on that morning from a simple spray of holly than from a glittering spray of diamonds.

Down at the secret well-spring of human nature is a longing to have our friends think of us thoroughly and study our tastes; and if a Christmas gift can carry gratification in this it will be a complete success. No other kind can be.

Indeed, the gifts that give most pleasure are often the simplest work of one's own hands or some trifle worth little except that it is especially eloquent of the sentiment it is intended to express.

But what violence we do these simple truths!

The buying of Christmas gifts has become the great financial strain of the year.

In the jumble and scramble of the shops we forget all the real, sweet, sacred meaning of the season.

It is a common idea that a Christmas gift, to express proper feeling, must be "respectable," and that is regarded as synonymous with costly. The average purchase for Christmas involves an expenditure that the giver cannot well afford, for the sake of something the recipient does not want. So Christmas gifts, the tenderest tokens of affection saved to us from Paradise, have come to be without meaning except as cold barter and exchange, in which both parties lose much and gain little.

Like Cyrus, we give the golden bauble instead of the coveted kiss.

The two friends who regularly exchange gold eagles every Christmas as presents have all the sentiment without the worries and disappointments of the silly and sacrilegious custom of barter and exchange.

There are gifts for the eyes.
And there are gifts for the heart.
There are gifts to be worn on the breast, or the neck, or the hands.
And there are gifts to be carried in the soul.

What Becomes of the Pennies ?

COMPARATIVELY few persons may be aware of the fact that in various parts of the country there is a scarcity of one-cent pieces which almost amounts to a famine. This odd development in national finance has been made the subject of an investigation by the National City Bank of New York, and some very interesting facts have been brought to light. From 1793 till 1916, the total number of one-cent coins issued by the mints was 2,804,000,000, of which a billion were issued in the last decade, the annual average now being 100,000,000 a year. During the first years of coinage (1793-1795) about 1,066,033 one-cent pieces and 142,524 half-cent pieces were issued. There seems to have been a sharp race for popularity between the two, for from 1804 to 1810 the issue of half-cent coins almost equaled that of the pennies. Soon afterward, for some unexplained reason, the half-cent lost its popularity, and it was only issued at intervals until 1860, when its coinage ceased altogether. During the Civil War the coinage of pennies increased threefold, declining sharply after the war had closed. The present war seems to have affected the penny similarly, but in larger degree. All the one-cent pieces now coined are of bronze, though the earliest were of copper, which was followed by the nickel pennies, in both cases the proportion of copper or nickel being very small. Insignificant as the penny is, its scarcity, should it become general, would occasion perhaps more inconvenience than the dearth or absence of some coins of higher denomination. That the penny will become acutely scarce, however, is hardly probable, especially in view of the fact that the profit on the manufacture of the one-cent and five-cent pieces is almost sufficient to pay the running expenses of the national mint. Meanwhile the puzzling question, "What becomes of the pennies?" remains unsolved.

Christmas Features

THE next two numbers of the Christian Herald will be rich in Christmas features.

A four-page rotogravure section will appear next week carrying valuable illustrations in beautiful colors. In this there will be a series of scenes and types in the Holy Land, made up of original photographs. In the second number will be a double-page article, "The Star and the Child," by Charles Grant Miller, elaborately illuminated with special drawings by O. Sandreczky.

Dr. David James Burrell contributes the Christmas Sermon next week, under the title "The Bells of Bethlehem." Dr. J. M. Gray, the following week, will have a "Homily on the Old Year."

"The Alien," a Christmas fantasy by Curt Hansen, is a strong, sweet story to appear.

Margaret E. Sangster in "The Desert Path," a series of sonnets, attains her highest quality.

More Religion for the Army

WE are making an army the cleanest, morally, since Cromwell's Ironsides finished their service. The War Department is now printing an order that will double its number of chaplains. Never before has a nation taken so advanced a position on moral matters in time of war as the United States in the present struggle. Not only will our soldiers be properly clothed, fed, armed and otherwise equipped, but their character and their efficiency will be protected by regulations concerning sobriety and continence. The stand on this subject taken by our government is unprecedented in any war or by any nation. To the provisions already made the War Department is now adding an additional personal factor that will delight the heart of every Christian who has a son or brother in the army.

A new interpretation to the present law concerning the chaplains is to be issued, and we are fortunate at this early date to be able to give our readers some of its details. Twelve chaplains will be assigned to each army division. The division consists of eight regiments, and it is expected that one chaplain will be assigned by the division commander to each regiment. The four remaining chaplains will be distributed to other groups as seems necessary. These other groups, which have not previously had chaplains under the present law, include anti-aircraft artillery battalions, machine-gun battalions, service battalions of the quartermaster's corps, labor battalions of engineers, aero wings, and "such like regiments and battalions as may be organized." For each army corps ten additional chaplains will be assigned in order to cover the need not thus met. The corps will include six divisions. Further chaplains will be supplied for each army headquarters, perhaps to the number of forty.

This increase will apply alike to the Regular Army, the National Army and the National Guard. Chaplains going into any of these openings will serve for the war only. It is understood that if they desire, they may apply to be transferred to the permanent service, but very few of the chaplains now entering the service desire to remain. Most of them enter as a patriotic and divine duty, with the intention of returning to the pastorate when the war is over.

Previous to the issuance of this new interpretation the present law provided one chaplain for each regiment of infantry, cavalry, field artillery and engineers. At the time of its passage the regiment contained twelve hundred men, and therefore provision was made to appoint a chaplain for each twelve hundred men of the coast artillery, which was not, and is not, regimentally organized. The law did not make provision for chaplains in groups not regimentally organized, outside of the coast artillery. The Federal Council of Churches, with the cooperation of the Catholic authorities, introduced a bill near the close of the last session of Congress to provide for all such groups, and to give additional chaplains for the regiments which have been tripled in size since the passage of the law. The bill would put the appointment of chaplains on a numerical basis, one for each twelve hundred men, so that the law would be permanent and self-adjusting to any possible reorganization of the army and its later reduction to a peace footing. This new interpretation of the law is a step in the right direction and will accomplish in part what the bill would provide. The need of the situation, however, will not be fully met until the bill becomes law.

Rodin, Great Sculptor, Dead

AUGUSTE RODIN, the world-famed sculptor, died in his villa on the outskirts of Paris, November 17, at the age of 77. He was born in Paris November 12, 1846, of wretchedly poor parents. He entered a free drawing-school in the Latin Quarter at the age of 14, and after several years of study made a model in clay of one of his companions, with which he tried to win entrance to the Academy of Fine Arts. He failed, as he did in two other similar attempts. Barye, the painter and sculptor of animals, gave this student, struggling so hard with poverty, some lessons in art which gave him spirit and skill. At twenty-three he married a wife who was a great comfort and inspiration to him. In twelve months later he had produced his first masterpiece. After the siege of Paris he went to Brussels, where he executed some great works, including two busts which the Salon of Paris accepted. His "La France" was presented by France to America, and "The Thinker" is in the Metropolitan Museum in New York. What an illustration of triumph over hindrances the life of the great sculptor furnishes in his success in the face of almost fifty years of the bitterest criticism of professional artists! Paul Laurens, the painter, said of Rodin, "He belongs to the race of those who march alone." And so he did march alone, first beating his way against the adversities of relentless poverty and hostile criticism, and in the later years of his life alone at the head of an international army of enthusiastic admirers. One of his early works was refused by the Academy of Fine Arts in a note which said, "It did not exhibit evidence of talent," and then fifty years afterward critics in many places were hailing him as the greatest sculptor of the world—save Michael Angelo—since Phidias and Praxiteles. He faced starvation because nobody would buy his statues, and in October, 1916, the French Chamber of Deputies accepted his gift of his works of art collections, valued at $400,000, and gave him for life the Biron Mansion in Paris, which became known through act of parliament as the Rodin Museum. Much of the criticism of Rodin grew out of his intense realism, which made some of his work appear rough to those critics who think that beauty is the all of art, forgetting that truth is its greatest charm. He was greater than they because he put the tired look in the face of the old man or the cripple with as much care as he put beauty in the figure of the woman or strength in that of a man. God is the Absolute Painter and Sculptor. "So God created man in his own image, in the image of God created he him." (Gen. 1 : 27.)

Boston's Scramble for Sugar

THE shortage in sugar has been well-nigh universal in this country. In some communities none was for sale at the grocers'; in others a pound a day was allowed to customers as a favor. When news of the arrival of a shipment of sugar—2,400 pounds—spread through the West End section of Boston it needed the police to keep order and prevent the storming of the treasure-house where the article was being sold, a small grocery store on Cotting Street. No public announcement of a sale had been made, but the good news spread quickly, and the truck on which the sugar arrived had hardly drawn up to the pavement before it was besieged by a wild mob. The wagon with its cargo was driven into an alley and the gates locked. Policemen were called and order was restored. The stock disappeared in record time, being sold at twenty-one cents for two pounds. The valuable packages were handed out to the customers by policemen inside the gates. There has been no real sugar famine; there is plenty of sugar on hand and in sight for home consumption. The temporary shortage has been on account of our generosity in furnishing sugar to the Allies. The situation has been eased by the seizure by Herbert C Hoover, Food Administrator, of 35,000,000 pounds of sugar which had been sold to the old Russian government and which it was thought wise to retain and distribute to the retail trade of New York City. The situation will be still further eased by the promise of an early harvest of the crop in Cuba, and large shipments East of beet sugar from San Francisco. The sugar scare will do good, as it will make the people more economical, and thus help solve the great economic problem so necessary to national success. The Jews used honey as their sweet article of food. Sugar-cane was known in Bible times. It was not grown in Palestine, but was imported. There is this reference to the fact: "To what purpose cometh there to me incense from Sheba, and the sweet cane from a far country?" (Jer. 6 : 20.)

Armless Boy's Heroism

THE other day a lad of eight years was playing with his younger brother on the breakwater in Chicago when he slipped and fell into Lake Michigan. His brother ran screaming to a crowd of boys playing near by, and Johnnie Curran, a boy of seventeen, who had lost both his arms, rushed to the place where the boy fell, and dived into the water. He had learned to swim without his arms, and, as the drowning boy came up for the last time not far from him, he swam to him, caught the garments of the boy with his teeth and swam back with him to the pier. Efforts to resuscitate the little fellow thus rescued were unavailing, and he died before the ambulance arrived. In the annals of American heroism there are few braver acts than that of Johnnie Curran, the armless boy. The story ought to be told in the day schools and Sunday schools as an eloquent sermon on heroic service for others. Johnnie Curran caught the spirit of Him who said: "The Son of man cometh to seek and to save that which was lost." (Luke 19 : 10.)

Perish Fighting Forest Fire

TWELVE mountaineers were burned to death November 16 while fighting a forest fire in the Ramapo Mountains near Allendale, N. J., which had been raging for four days. The men were members of a band of 200 special deputy fire wardens, sworn in for the emergency. The fire was burning near the American Brake Shoe and Foundry Company's plant in Mahwah. The 1,000 employees were released to fight the flames, and followed the lead of these twelve wardens near the edge of Bear Swamp. While they were fighting the fire which the wind was blowing to the right of them, the mountaineers did not notice that a veering wind was also sweeping it to the left, forming a circle about them. They did not discover their plight until the flames had surrounded them. Then the twelve tried to fight their way out with the fire gradually closing in on them. Three hundred men vainly tried to reach the imprisoned mountaineers. A quarter of an hour after they were trapped the fire had comcompletely closed in on them and burned them beyond recognition. The dead included two brothers from the three families of Washington, Peters, and Parissimy, and three brothers by the name of Johnson. It was the saddest day they ever had in the mountains, and there was much crying at the funeral held for all the men at one time. Our first breath is, "Poor fellows!" Our next expression is "Superb, manly mountaineers, brave men, real heroes, giving up their own lives in protecting the property and lives of others!" Their physical lives were snuffed out, but their heroism is immortal. Christ, the ideal and inspiration of all sacrifice, said: "He that findeth his life shall lose it; and he that loseth his life for my sake shall find it." (Matt. 10 : 39.)

Terrible Typhoon in Tokyo

IN a letter to a relative in this country, Rev. E. T. Iglehart, a Methodist missionary, a teacher in the theological school of Aoyama, Tokyo, gives a graphic description of the terrible typhoon in Japan, which came so near killing Bishop Welch, the Methodist Bishop of Korea and Japan. The letter says: "We had a terrible typhoon here a week ago. It lasted from about one until six in the morning. I was afraid that the house would go, especially when the windows began to blow in. But we weathered it all right. Bishop Welch was in the next house. The storm took off the roof over where he was sleeping. Thousands of houses were blown down, or washed away by the flood. About 500 people in Tokyo were killed and as many wounded, with many more still missing. It was the worst storm in forty years. Traffic and communications were interrupted for some time. One report has it that 16,000 fishing-boats along the coast were sunk, and 300 people drowned. The perils of hurricane, of earthquake, of disease the missionaries face gladly out of their love for the Christ that died for them, who gave them this commission: "Go ye into all the world, and preach the Gospel to every creature." (Mark 16 : 15.)

The Problem of Protestant Unity

A SERMON BY PASTOR JUNIUS B. REMENSNYDER[*]

TEXT—Eph. 4 : 4-6. "There is one Spirit . . . one Lord, one faith, one baptism, one God and Father of all."

THE four hundredth anniversary of the Reformation has evoked a celebration perhaps unexampled in Christian history. Despite the thunder of cannon, the clash of arms and the fields of human slaughter, millions in every land have gathered in their sanctuaries to commemorate it with an enthusiasm such as no civic memorial could inspire. This has given the world a practical illustration of the essential unity of Protestantism. Under its different phases, forms and organizations, there lies a generic agreement.

The old world and the new, Europe, the Americas, India, Africa and the Isles of the Sea, Protestants of every church and name have joined in it with one heart and mind, forgetting all their minor differences as they proclaimed its vital truths. Does it not show Christians the practical possibility of a larger union—one world-wide Protestant Church of Christ? What joy, what inspiration, what strength this would give us all, and how it would speed forward the triumphant march of the Kingdom of God! Is not Protestant unity then, a timely theme, one that this united festival should urge upon every Christian's thought and conscience? Our text gives us a clear and emphatic expression of the standpoint of Scripture as to this duty. And no more urgent one can demand our attention.

In nature there is but one law, one force, one order, one universal plan. Throughout space there is not the least jar or clash in this unity, or there would follow chaos, wreck, ruin. So in the world of spirit, the Scriptures declare that there is but one God, the Father of all the peoples of earth. So when He came who said: "One is your Master, even Christ, and all ye are brethren," the estranged race was called back to this duty of harmony, fraternity and peace.

The first Christian centuries presented such a scene as had never been witnessed on earth since the exile from Eden. The Disciples of Jesus in every land, and of every peculiarity of race and diversity of language, constituted but one family. They all belonged to the same Church and household of God. No differences of faith estranged them, no divergences of ritual separated them, no envious interests chilled their love, no denominational bars kept them apart. They marched under no different names. No ensign but the Cross was uplifted over their hosts. There was one "holy, universal and apostolic Church" throughout the whole world, of which the humblest and the greatest alike was a member. Time and again great captains by force of arms had sought to form one vast world empire, but had met with woeful failure. But here at last, under the invisible sovereignty of Jesus Christ, there arose a universal empire, engirdling land and sea, overlapping all nations and races, and uniting Christians everywhere in one spirit, tie and name.

IT was a most beautiful and enchanting vision, and there can be no doubt that this spectacle of world unity was one of the most potent causes of the early Church's unprecedented progress. The world was impressed and awed by what it beheld. And the conviction resulted: "Verily, there is a moral miracle; this is what Pagan history could never achieve; this is not of man, but of the power of God."

What an unhappy contrast to this beautiful ideal the present divided and distracted state of Christendom exhibits! Some tell us that this condition is altogether natural; that it is but such a variety as is shown in the natural world. Very true it is that in nature we behold the law. Diversity in unity; that no two flowers, or trees, or lakes, or mountains, or landscapes are monotonously alike, but each has its distinctive miracle of design and beauty. That also every race, community and nation has its own peculiar character.

Yea! Every single human being has his individual type. But this diversity is one in secondary features, and does not contradict that dominant law of unity which everywhere underlies, overreaches and binds together all the parts in one. It is but variety in unity, hence it is a very diverse thing from churches of one common master departing from one another's fellowship, and erecting separate organizations, creeds, altars and pulpits, which are a protest against and a censure of each other. Certainly this brings us under the condemnation of the apostle, who affirms that when one Christian says: "I am of Paul, and another I am of Apollos, and another I am of Peter, Christ is divided." Who does not know that these irreconcilable divisions into separate denominations do more than all else to weaken Christian influence and to afford an excuse to the worldly for remaining outside the Church altogether?

NO wonder, then, that thoughtful Christians should lament this unnatural and unhappy state of affairs in Zion, separating Christians and even dividing families, and that they should consider it their solemn duty to give it close study and to labor and pray that it may be remedied.

To do this profitably let us ask first: What is Christian Unity? What did Christ mean by the unity he enjoined upon his followers? And what is the unity so constantly urged in the Gospels and Epistles? There is no better answer in all the New Testament than the famous passage we have chosen for our text. "There is one Spirit, one Lord, one faith, one baptism, one God and Father of All."

"There is one Spirit." Christian unity is first, then, a unity of spirit. It is a oneness of heart, a likeness of soul, a harmony in spiritual temper. A thousand discordant influences form the natural man. What then can be expected except those envies, prejudices, hates and warrings which have so disfigured history? But all true Christians, born again by the Holy Spirit, are "new creatures in Christ Jesus." Hence they are cast in the same common mold. They are fashioned in the same image of Christ. They are begotten of the same Spirit. And having this harmony of mind and temper, there should be no divisions, no bickerings, no contentions between them; but, bound together by the tie of love, they should live as one spiritual family, in one common concord, fellowship and communion.

ONE faith, further says our text. This is a most important addition. Unity of "Spirit" is general, but unity of "faith" is definite and specific. Christianity is not only a spirit, a sentiment, a temper of love, but it is also a faith. It sets forth clear-cut beliefs. It embraces a positive system of evangelical teaching. It preaches a Gospel of revealed truths. And a unity that has any just claim to be Christian must therefore be one of and in this faith, from which issue our spirit and temper. It is our convictions which mold our lives. Unless, then, we be grounded in the Christian faith as the root and spring of our characters, light as air will be our pretext of spiritual unity. Agreement in faith will alone lead to similarity of life, aim, conduct and hope. Therefore says the apostle: "Now I beseech you, brethren, by the name of our Lord Jesus Christ, that ye all speak the same thing, and that there be no divisions among you, but that ye be perfectly joined together in the same mind and in the same judgment."

In further pursuance of this injunction, the primitive Church drew up those short and comprehensive summaries of belief, the Apostles' and Nicene Creeds, that thus, with one mouth and voice, Christians might join in the confession and testimony of that one common faith which, despite whatever minor diversities marked them, bound them together as with a bond of adamant the world over. Men who tell us they can be Christians in spirit while believing very little of Christian teaching and even rejecting cardinal Scriptural doctrines, are dangerously self-deceived. Christian unity is a real thing, not an empty myth, and hence it must rest upon a solid, tangible basis. It can only exist where there is agreement in the faith, concurrence in the truth as it is in Jesus.

ONE baptism, one body, continues our text. That is true; Christian unity is outward as well as inward. It is visible as well as invisible. It is not only in the faith and spirit, but in "body," in "baptism," i.e. in outward form, in sacramental rites, in the external and visible signs of communion. In other words, Christian unity implies Church unity. The New Testament knows of but one Church. Its name everywhere is the same. It is called simply the "Church," or the "Church of Christ," or the "Church of God." No party names have as yet been fixed upon it. Its visible rites and sacraments are the same. Its government—under the two offices of minister and deacon—is everywhere the same. Its terms of admission are universally the same, baptism for children and confirmation for youth. A Christian in the Church at Jerusalem is also a Christian in fellowship and regular standing with the Church in Ephesus, or Corinth, or Carthage, or Sardis, or Rome.

There is but one ecclesiastical organization, but one great Christian empire, but one Holy City, but one temple, but one gate, throughout the whole world. And so that is but a very unsatisfactory unity which, with all its ardent profession of love, still dwells apart, refusing to live together or to commune at the same altar, or to work and worship together, and which, with now and then a few complimentary salutes over the walls, goes back to build those walls higher and more insurmountable than ever.

When Christians have the real, Scriptural yearning for "Unity in the Spirit," and feel that they have but "One Lord, one Spirit, one faith, one baptism, one body, one God and Father of All," as our text urges, they will not be content with any mere makeshift and hollow courtesy, but they will want the real thing—Church unity. They will want to abandon their denominational, separatistic camps and blend together in the one holy Church Universal.

Secondly: What is it that prevents us from having this blessed unity of the New Testament time and of the golden era of primitive Christendom? What brought about the disruption of the one Church of Christ, and led to the present unhappy divisions? We answer that it was partly the love of truth and strong, conscientious conviction, and partly the infirmities and petty contentions of weak human nature. The first great breach occurred in the sixth century, when, over the comparatively trivial dispute as to the time of observing Easter, the Greek, which was the original and oldest Church, beginning at Jerusalem, broke off from the later Roman or Latin branch. The next great division the Roman Catholics charge upon Luther as the offender in the Reformation.

THE Romanist, Dr. Walsh, praises the century preceding the Reformation as the greatest of centuries, and cites this eloquent description of it from the historian Frederic Harrison: "This great century, the last of the true Middle Ages, has a special character of its own that gives it an enchanting and abiding interest. There was one common creed, one ritual, one worship, one sacred language, one Church, a single code of manners, a uniform scheme of society, a common system of education, an accepted type of beauty, a universal art, something like a recognized standard of the good, the beautiful, and the true. Men utterly different from each other, all profoundly accepted one common order of ideas, and could all feel that they were all together working out the same task." Is not this beautiful picture the very ideal of Christian unity and harmony that we are aiming at? And did Luther and his co-laborers destroy this splendid fabric? The reply is that this imposing structure of uniformity was at the sacrifice of real unity. And it merely retained the semblance of Christianity from which the soul of true piety had been banished. It was the harmony of tyranny, the uniformity of stagnation, the peace of death. And Luther sought not to destroy this majestic temple of unity, but only to cleanse it from the corruptions feeding upon its life, and which have made the Middle Ages to be called the Dark Ages, when civilization had reached the lowest ebb in history. Hence Luther's purpose was only to save, not to destroy, and the last thought in his mind was to break in twain this unity of the Church of God. So, when the die was about to be cast, he wrote an humble letter to the Pope saying that "he never could or would commit the awful sin of schism in Christ's Church. But he must be faithful to his conscience and continue to preach the pure Gospel for the guidance and saving of lost souls!"

THEREUPON he was excommunicated and, millions following him, the second great breach occurred. How can then that schism be charged upon Luther? He denied the right of Rome to cast him out of the Church, and it was because he protested against this and other tyrannous papal acts, that he and his followers came to be called Protestants, from their famous Protest at the Diet of Speyer in 1529.

Then Zwingli differed from Luther, and Calvin from both, and Wesley from them all, and each set up a separate communion. And now in our day the spirit of sectarianism has run riot. Individualism largely supplants authority. Every innovator with a new ism imagines that he can start another Christian denomination. In the United States the evil of sect has attained its worst extravagance. It would seem here as if the name of the sects confronting us was legion.

And is not this deplorable state of Christendom a sin against the authority and headship of Jesus, a sin against the oneness of Christ's body, a sin against

The Contagion of Hypocrisy

SUNDAY, December 16. Gal. 2 : 13, 14. "Many of the Jews dissembled likewise with Peter, insomuch that even Barnabas also was carried away by their dissimulation." Here is a man trying to wear two sorts of livery, to please two different masters; and others follow his example, until even Barnabas is caught in the prevailing fashion and resorts to the double dress! Mr. Facing-both-ways becomes a type, and others shape their lives on his dubious model. Inconsistency becomes a vogue.

In some measure, and perhaps in a much larger measure than we conceive, we are all the setters of moral and spiritual fashions. We speak of the force of example, but perhaps the force is far deeper, and far more subtle and energetic, than we commonly believe. It is more than probable that the emanations of character are like a secret army which cannot be stayed. I mean that it is almost certain that the emanations are as real and positive as the emanations of a flower or a cesspool. It may be that it is not necessary for us to see a man in order to be vitally influenced by him. His very presence will suffice. Nay, his very being will suffice! Our Lord has surely disclosed this tremendous possibility in the wonderful words, "He that believeth in me, out of him shall flow rivers of water!" And that not only from what he says, or from what he does, but preeminently from what he is, even in the apparently passive seasons of his life, when he is absolutely quiet and silent. The believer in Christ possesses a certain affluence; the power of it inevitably emerges as an effluence; it touches the lives of others as a holy influence. We all recognize their blessed ministry. Every preacher knows when they are in his congregation, for he feels their vitalizing rivers of life.

But it is surely equally true of men and women who are not believers in Jesus Christ; their lives are also fountains in which rivers are born, only the rivers are of quite another kind. The insincere man emits perverting energies which tend to make society crooked. His insincerity works to make everybody insincere. He is the secret ally of our worst selves.

But, blessed be God, the converse of this is true. One absolutely sincere man in any company tends to make everybody true. His views are vital and vitalizing. He may be the most silent member in the fellowship, but his very presence is a second conscience to the entire circle. His spiritual emanations form an alliance with all that is honorable and aspiring in our own lives. His contagion is the contagion of health. And his explanation is found in these words: "The water that I shall give him shall be in him a well!" That holy well is the birthplace of the soul's river of water of life. "All my springs are in thee!"

A Woman Who Outwitted Jesus

MONDAY, December 17. Mark 7 : 28. "And she answered and said unto him, Yes, Lord; yet the dogs under the table eat of the children's crumbs." It has been said that this Gentile woman was the only person who ever defeated Jesus in argument. Doubtless, Jesus was a willing victim of her wit. It was not in his heart to deny her request. If he seemed not to respond to her cry for help, it was only that he might evoke the strength of her faith. He tried her as we sometimes try our children, withholding gifts only that we may discover the eloquence of their plea.

It may not seem strange to us now, in this day of cosmopolitanism, but was very strange then, in an age in which there were but few catholic minds, that Jesus was as popular outside of his native country as in it. Had he been a narrow-minded Jew, only Jews would have felt an interest in him. But the Samaritans were drawn to him, and the Greeks felt the attraction of his august and winsome personality.

The finest type of Roman minds turned to him. There is not a Roman officer—army officer, that is—in the New Testament who does not seem to see in Christ vastly more than most Jews saw. This woman is called a Greek. Whatever her nationality, she was a Gentile. She came seeking help. Whom does she represent, this Gentile woman? Immediately she represents her sick child and her own suffering soul, but remotely she represents the whole Gentile world. She and the Greeks who said to Andrew and Philip, "We would see Jesus," and the Roman centurion who had such faith that it amazed Jesus, were "the first low wash of the waves where soon should roll a human sea."

If we think Jesus meant to deny this poor woman the boon she asked, we do not rightly know him. Every good impulse of humanity—and mother-love is humanity's best impulse—he honors. The total submergence of self in the thought of another's need is so divine Jesus must have honored it. There is no kingdom whose entrance doors do not swing wide open to admit a faith and love like that of the woman who spoke these words. C. C. A.

The Eternal Truth

TUESDAY, December 18. Luke 21 : 33. "Heaven and earth shall pass way; but my words shall not pass away." In its march through the centuries the Bible has encountered myriads of enemies. The wisdom of the philosophers, the might of kings, the carnal sentiments of the masses, have been arrayed against it. Time and again the world has heard the proud boast of infidel men: "A little while and the Bible will be no more." Skeptics, rationalists, atheists have made incessant assaults upon it; like the waves of the ocean they have incessantly thrown themselves against God's Book. What have they accomplished? Silent and grand the Bible stands today towering over the wreck of all their powerful engines of assault. Like against a rock in mid-ocean the billows of unbelief are dashed to spray at its feet, and its grandest message, the tidings of salvation by the crucified Jesus, shines with undiminished luster.

Christians have watched with palpitating hearts the mad onslaughts that are made upon the Word of God; they have no reason to fear. Clouds of witnesses rise up in every century to assure them of the unconquerable power of the oracles of God. It is able to maintain itself against all odds. Yea, it will outlast the final doom. The present order of things in the created universe will one day pass away. When the earth and the heavens which we behold now shall have served the purpose for which God made them, he will abolish them. But he will not abolish the Word that he has spoken. The very collapse of all created things will rather help to authenticate this Book; its final threats and promises will be fulfilled by those very events, and thus the Book itself will be verified as the unsuppressible, ever-enduring voice of God to men by the vanishing of everything else. "Blessed are they that hear the word and keep it," says the Lord. Let us esteem the Word as our highest treasure on earth. Let us study its lessons well in this fleeting time; we shall spend an eternity of happiness and glory in reviewing them. W. H. T. D.

The Holy Babe

WEDNESDAY, December 19. Luke 2 : 12. "Ye shall find the Babe wrapped in swaddling clothes, lying in a manger." Correggio's Holy Night occupies the chief place among all the portrayals of the Nativity. It stands alongside the Sistine Madonna in its general popularity. The brilliant light of the scene rises from the form of the Holy Child, radiating purity and beauty throughout the dark manger till the morning breaks over the hills.

The shepherds who have just arrived are almost blinded by the soft beams from the Child's face. One of them seems to be telling the mother of their vision of the angels, but Mary's eyes are beholding a more enrapturing sight—the face of the wonderful child. In the air above hovers a company of angelic spirits, as if keeping vigils over the Babe. Mary is kneeling before the rude wooden crib with her arms encircling the Child. She has a facial expression of intense interest and tenderness. Joseph in the background is preventing the donkey from getting too near the scene. Songs of joy and gladness are hailing the newborn King, the center of the picture, and the world's desire.

The heavenly Father is never nearer a human soul than when he lays a little child in a mother's arms; but when that child is His only begotten Son, the Lord of Glory, the Saviour of men, what bliss must have filled that mother's heart on that holy, silent night! Her whole being seems transfigured with the thought that she has become the medium for the Son of God to be made flesh for the redemption of the world. E. W. C.

The Threefold Cord of Love

THURSDAY, December 20. Deut. 6 : 5. "Thou shalt love the Lord thy God with all thine heart, and with all thy soul, and with all thy might." It is difficult to determine just what distinctions were made by those to whom these words were first spoken between the heart and the soul. Possibly the same we make between the soul and the spirit. However, we may safely infer that this threefold love includes the whole of life embraced by our terms mind and spirit and body. What is it to love God with the mind? It is to have correct views of his character, to seek to understand his laws in nature and in grace. It is to share the feelings of the astronomer who, watching the countermarching of the host of suns and planets, cried out, "O God, I think thy thoughts after thee."

What is it to love God with the spirit? It is to enter into the secret of God's presence, to yearn for communion with him, to realize it, and to exult in it.

What is it to love God with all the might? This involves the cooperation of the will with the mind and the spirit. The mind adores God. The spirit worships him. The will serves him. Of little avail is the love of the mind and the spirit if the body be not the servant of these. The cause of many a Christian failure is in the unsubdued tyranny of the flesh. An apostle speaks of the weakness of the flesh, meaning its weariness, its limited capacity to endure. Most of us find the flesh strong enough to test the spirit of its strength in the unending conflict between the material and the spiritual. Let us often read the tender plea, "I beseech you therefore by the mercies of God, to present your bodies a living sacrifice, holy, acceptable to God which is your spiritual service." Thus, loving God with heart and will and might, we shall be bound to him by a threefold cord which shall not easily be broken. C. C. A.

"The Day Is at Hand"

FRIDAY, December 21. Rom. 13 : 12. "The night is far spent, the day is at hand; let us therefore cast off the works of darkness, and let us put on the armor of light." Years, no doubt, had passed between the time when the Christians at Rome had for the first time known the truth as it is in Jesus Christ and the time when this Epistle was received by them, which the apostle sent them instead of paying them a personal visit. They had advanced from knowledge to knowledge and from grace to grace since the time that they first believed. The night of paganism which had shrouded them when the Gospel came to them was past; they were walking in the light of God's truth. But all around them the night of paganism still held sway. Works of darkness were still done by their heathen fellow citizens; and what those works were the apostle has told in the first and second chapters of this Epistle. He is filled with concern for his dear Christians in the wicked metropolis of the world, lest they be drawn again into the ways of the heathen or lest they have not completely put off practices and habits that are unbecoming the children of God. Hence this earnest call: "The night is far spent! The day is at hand!"

As the years of our lives as Christians are increased, we too ought to survey our conduct under divine grace and see whether we have forged away in our Christian pilgrimage from the ways of worldly men, whether the garments of salvation in which Jesus has robed us have been kept unspotted, whether we rejoice to breathe the pure atmosphere of Christian surroundings, or whether there is in us still some hankering after the polluting and abasing delights of the carnal mind. The waning year suggests such thoughts. If our self-scrutiny discovers to our shocked senses that we have permitted ourselves to slide back into unspiritual practices and habits, if we feel an inclination to seek the old darkness and shun the light, the call of the apostle comes to us now: The night is far spent, the day is at hand; cast off the works of darkness; put on the armor of light! Be a warrior for Christ, even if you have to fight against yourself, and smite your pet sins as a good old Roman warrior smote his enemies. W. H. T. D.

Leading by Heartstrings

SATURDAY, December 22. Isa. 11 : 6. "A little child shall lead them." A little fellow dying said to the dear ones, "I am going to be an angel, and pa and ma can come too." How true that heaven will not be complete until we are with them there! The children in this world have a great drawing power in leading us to Christ. In one of Billy Sunday's meetings in Boston, a bright-faced little girl said to a leading business man as he was going into the meeting, "Mr. Saunders, wouldn't you like to be a Christian?" This hardened sinner, who had refused to let his wife come home for twenty years because he had told her she could not come unless she would tie religion outside; this man, whom preachers could not reach, had his heart broken by a child. That night he sat by the altar of prayer and nearly cried his eyes out, with tears of repentance and consecration.

It is said that one day when Francis Murphy was in his prison cell, a friend took one of his children to visit him. As the little one leaned over with tears dropping on his breast, she said, "Papa, we are homesick at our house without you." These tender words changed the convict's whole after life. When he had reformed, he said, "Man is lost beyond the possibility of redemption if the divinity of his nature does not listen when a child speaks the word 'home' in his ear." E. W. C.

Meat and Wheat to Feed the World

Uncle Sam's Greatest Task in Helping to Win the War

Copyright, 1917, by Frank G. Carpenter

I AM at the nozzle of the great grain funnel of the Northwest. Minneapolis is the wheat and flour center of the world, and in our task of feeding the armies and peoples of Europe it stands first in importance among the centers of food production today. It has been said that there are but three factors in our war with the Germans. These are funds, munitions of war and food. That we can supply the first two is being proved daily by the success of the liberty loans and our great shipments of guns, shells and explosives across the ocean to the battlefields of France and Italy.

Feeding the world! That is the task that has been set Uncle Sam. The great wheat and grain resources of Russia, the country second to the United States, have been cut off by the Germans. Food Commissioner Hoover says that the wheat crops of Europe will this year fall 500,000,000 bushels below their normal production, and that as a minimum we must ship to them 225,000,000 bushels of wheat. And then there are the great armies. Uncle Sam expects to have a million men at the front as soon as they can be trained and transported. It would take 5,771 barrels of flour every twenty-four hours, or the entire crop from a wheat field almost four miles square. This flour would make nearly two million loaves of bread.

Minneapolis is the biggest flour milling city in the world

THE official estimate for the crop of 1917 is placed at 653,000,000 bushels, or only 153,000,000 bushels more than we usually consume here at home. Taking out the 100,000,000 bushels necessary for seed, we should have left only 53,000,000 bushels for export. This would clean up every bushel of wheat produced this year and empty the bins in every elevator in the country. And yet Mr. Hoover says we must have no less than 225,000,000 bushels for export to France.

Minneapolis is the largest flour city in the world. It is one of the leading grain markets in the country, and it stands at the top of the list as the greatest primary wheat market on the globe. Since 1897 the annual output of its mills has exceeded 13,000,000 barrels and its flour is known all over the world. All of the flour mills of Minneapolis are huddled together about the falls of St. Anthony, only six blocks from the business part of the city. Here the Mississippi River makes a drop of forty-eight feet, as it rolls on down toward the Gulf. The water is conducted into great turbines, and altogether it developes about 60,000 horse-power. This is almost all used for the mills. This milling district consists of enormous buildings of limestone rising to a height of 100 to 200 feet. Railroad tracks on trestles run here and there, high above the ground, and the trains bring the wheat to the very doors of the mills. There are a number of elevators connected with the mills and the great terminal elevators rise high above the city in every direction. Minneapolis has about fifty of these great grain bins with a combined capacity of 45,000,000 bushels. They are chockful of wheat. A single one contains 3,000,000 bushels. A steady stream of grain flows out of it on endless belt conveyors at the rate of 40,000 bushels per hour. The conveyors carry the wheat through tunnels to the mills, and it does not stop until it comes out as flour and is loaded on the cars to be sent to the consumer.

I FOUND men on guard everywhere. As soon as we entered the war the government erected a fence of wire, eight or ten feet high, about the milling district, and it has kept soldiers there day and night who have instructions to shoot any one who attempts to get in without a pass.

The largest mill in Minneapolis means the largest mill in the world, and the one I visited today belongs to a company which grinds out over 35,000 barrels of flour every twenty-four hours. It takes about half a pound of flour to make a loaf of bread, so that the output of this company alone would give a loaf a day to 14,000,000 people or to more than the inhabitants of New York, Chicago, Philadelphia, Boston, Cleveland and Detroit combined. It handles every day in the neighborhood of 175,000 bushels of wheat

The Minneapolis millers are all making experiments and tests as to flour and meal for the Army. They make mixtures of corn and wheat flour and test the bread made as to food calories and keeping qualities.

I have had a talk with Mr. William C. Edgar, editor of the Northwestern Miller, one of the chief authorities on the wheat situation. I asked him as to the possibility of finding a substitute for wheat bread. Said he:

"As far as we can tell, any mixture or cutting down of wheat flour in the making of bread means just that much loss of food value. The Germans thought they could reduce the wheat contents of their loaves. They put in more of the bran, but it brought disease to the old and to the children, and the result was a loss of health and efficiency. England also has tried it, using 85 per cent. wheat flour. It was a failure. They experimented in Belgium in making the flour of the whole wheat berry. The result was rickets and stomach trouble and a good deal of tuberculosis. This was the experience of the Belgian relief committee.

"As soon as war was declared, the milling interests came together and organized to aid the government. They divided the country into eight natural divisions and selected one man to represent, organize and act for each division. The millers agreed that, during the war, they would take only normal profits and would try to prevent speculation of any kind. The basis for the price of flour is the actual cost of the wheat, plus the small profit justified for turning the wheat into flour."

IN the eight divisions to which Mr. Edgar referred there are 1,870 flour mills, with a daily capacity of 730,657 barrels of flour. That would make over 226,000,000 loaves of bread, or enough to give every day, two loaves to every man, woman and child in the United States.

This city of animals is as big as a 640 acre farm

I asked a miller how high flour would go. Said he:

"That would be hard to say. In other wars it has gone as high as $4.25, which was the average Liverpool price during the War of 1812. Just after the Civil War it reached $2.16, and in the second year of the Crimean War it rose to $2.34 a bushel. Of course, if the Food Administration is successful in regulating the price, we shall be saved from excessive hoarding and speculation. The real food dictator of America is the farmer. On him depends the supply and the price, and just now, when all industries and manufacturers are asked to take only a nominal profit, he will have to fall into line."

Chicago is the heart of the meat industry of the United States, and just now, when all the nations are fighting, it becomes most important as one of the great centers of the food supply. The Department of Agriculture's latest statistics of cattle, hogs and sheep for all parts of the world show that we have now on our farms 61,000,000 cattle, 68,000,000 hogs and 19,000,000 sheep. These alone are more than double the stock of Germany and Austria-Hungary. The animals from Bulgaria and Turkey added would not nearly equal those of our country.

Adventures in Neighboring

A Department for the Exchange of Experiences between Rural Women Who Have High Community Ideals and Are Putting Them into Practice

Conducted by VERA L. CONNOLLY

HAVE you, in your village, some neglected relic of the past—a shabby old town hall, a crumbling church, an ancient schoolhouse fallen into disrepair? And do you regard it as an "eyesore"? Is it heaped with rubbish? Is it windowless? Do the boys, on their way to the new brick schoolhouse, shy stones at it? Do the town authorities plan to sell it for junk?

If so, let me make a suggestion.

Gather the village together for a discussion of that old landmark. Get some of the old folks (with their memories of the past) to tell the thoughtless younger generation what the founding of that institution meant in struggle and self-sacrifice, in sheer unselfishness!

When the sympathy and loyalty of all have been enlisted, throw open the old building, and invite every one in the community to help renovate it and transform it into a center for civic interests. Whatever the community needs most can then be installed: either a lecture platform and chairs, or the beginnings of a free library, or, perhaps, equipment for club meetings, including piano, games and phonograph.

In case, on the other hand, your village has destroyed every "legacy from the past" except a dreary little town square, plan for a village "planting day," which shall transform that desolate enclosure into a riot of flowers. Benches can be added in the spring, and perhaps a swing or two for the children. The square will soon be the most popular spot in town.

All this may seem to involve trouble and expense. But the expense will be found slight, and the trouble repaid a thousand times in the changed attitude of the whole village.

For pride in the past—on the part of any community—soon results in pride in the present and ambition for the future. Once awaken the civic pride of a community, and the prosperity of that neighborhood, as well as those bordering on it, is practically assured.

AN instance of this is the progress of the little mountain community—twelve miles from a branch railroad terminus—described in the following letter from Tennessee:

Community School, Road, and Fair

The community I am writing about was away back in the mountains. The people did not, as a rule, get away once in twelve months: many never at all. The young folks were restless, as nothing ever happened to make any day different from the one that preceded it.

It was a young woman who came to teach the community school who started things to moving. At a school meeting, which the whole community attended, she organized a community club. This met once a week and had some interesting programs on farming and home topics. It was decided that the community's most urgent need was the repair of the school building. These repairs were made, some of the patrons contributing work, some material.

The club then discussed public roads (this county did not have a mile of pike or graded road) and planned to build a mile of graded road in front of the schoolhouse and through the center of the community. This plan was advertised through the county papers; and interesting speakers, for the noon hour, were procured. So, when the day came, there were men and teams, and visitors from other communities.

The women furnished the dinner, and encouraged the work by their presence. A mile of road was completed, and a much-needed bridge built across a nearby stream. And from this beginning, volunteer road-building spread into communities all over the county.

The Community Club next organized a Girls' Canning Club and Boys' Corn Club, and planned for a Community Fair the next fall. This fair was patterned after the County Fair, and was held in the little church, the schoolhouse not being suitably arranged. Counters were put up around the room for the exhibits, which would have done credit to any county fair. The agricultural agent and lady demonstrator judged them.

Invited speakers helped to entertain, and lunches and lemonade were sold to help defray expenses. The premiums were donated. Everybody had a good time; and that community has now the title of "the most progressive community in the county"!

WE jump now to a very different "adventure in neighboring," but one which deserves no less praise. Can't you see this dear neighbor, with her mending-bag and cheery greeting, making her loving rounds? I can! And I wish to thank her, here and now, for sharing her fine experience with us. Here is her stimulating letter:

Doing Neighbors' Mending

I have a neighbor, a mother of seven children, who is always overworked and not very strong. I have been doing her mending and buttonhole-making for a long time.

Sometimes, when able, I go to her house, carrying my thimble. If I am not able, I have her send the garments to me. After I had been mending one whole afternoon, she said, "It would have taken me a week to do that." It would have, because she has to stop so often to attend to one of the babies.

I do this mending simply from a desire to help her. And I try to help other mothers with their sewing and children. One lady so appreciated it that she once said, if she ever needed a friend she always came to me.

I am a widow, seventy-two years old, so cannot practice many plans of uplift; but I am thankful I can be a neighbor.

NOW comes a letter which, I think, is capital, because the problem confronting this neighborhood is common to all rural communities; and because this solution is so simple, convenient and inexpensive as to be within the reach of us all. This account is from the West, from Montana; and its writer has headed it:

A Reading Circle

Perhaps these few facts may be of help to some other community that has a "young folks'" problem.

In the autumn of ——, a new minister came to our little village. He and his wife were young folks themselves, and so were able to understand the problem we told him of in a conference with the Sunday school superintendent and others.

There was actually nothing to entertain or uplift our young people, and some of the rougher element had started dances which we could not approve of. As there was nothing else to do, some of our nicest young people were being drawn into them.

We decided to try getting our young people into some of our houses each week and reading a good book aloud.

We met once a week at the houses, and generally had two books on hand: one in a light, amusing vein, and the other a stronger, better book.

Gradually our "reading circle" enlarged until we had to use the church to meet in. We elected officers, and had a program committee, which furnished us good music and a recitation or two. Sometimes the program came first, sometimes the reading of the books. Between, there was an intermission for social enjoyment: a kind of "get together" time.

The pastor and his committee were ever on the alert to make the meetings interesting. He insisted on prompt opening and closing.

The whole town was drawn upon for assistance. So it wasn't a "church affair" or "clan entertainment"; but was for the mental help and good of everybody. Before the winter was over, there was hardly a person in the town (a little hamlet of two hundred people) who did not attend the reading circle; and there were no more rough dances to draw away our young people.

Our reading included fiction, history and biography; and the programs often contained "original poems" which were quite surprising.

I would like to say to other country villages, "Go thou and do likewise."

There are on my desk two remarkable letters: one, the most heroic instance of neighboring that has come to me since this department opened; the other, an appeal for advice on the part of an unselfish rural woman who can see that her community needs mothering, but who does not know just how to begin. The one letter you will want to read, the other you will want to answer. So do not miss next week's "Adventures in Neighboring"!

CHAPTER XXVII

COURTLAND got up, crossed the room, and stood looking out of the window on the myriad lights of the city. There was in his face a far yearning, and something too deep for words. It was as if he were waiting for a blow to fall.

Tennelly looked at Courtland's back and gathered up his courage: "Court," he said, hoarsely, trying to summon the nomenclature of the dear old days, "there's something I wanted to ask you. Was there anything—is there—between you and Gila Dare that makes it disloyal for your friend to try and win her if he can?"

It was very still in the room. The whir of the trolleys could be heard below as if they were out in the hall. They grated harshly on the silence. Courtland stood as if carved out of marble. It seemed ages to Tennelly before he answered, with the sadness of the grave in his tone:

"No, Nelly! It's all right! Gila and I didn't hit it off! It's all over between us forever. Go ahead! I wish you luck!"

There was an attempt at the old loving understanding in the answer, but somehow the last words had almost the sound of a sob in them. Tennelly had a feeling that he was wringing his own happiness out of his friend's soul:

"Thanks awfully, Court! I didn't know," he said, awkwardly. "I think she likes me a lot, but I couldn't do anything if you had the right of way."

WHEN Pat came back with a tray of glasses clinking with ice, and the smell of crushed lemons, they were talking of the new English professor and the chances that he would be better than the last, who was "punk." But Pat was not deceived. He looked from one to the other and knew the blow had fallen. He might have prevented it, but what was the use? It had to come sooner or later. They talked late. Finally, Tennelly rose and came toward Courtland, with his hand outstretched, and they all knew that the real moment of the evening had come at last:

"That was a great old talk you gave us this evening, Court!" Tennelly's voice was husky with feeling. He was holding Courtland's hand in a painful grip, and looking again into his eyes as if he would search his soul to the depths: "You sure have got hold of something there that's worth looking into! You had a great hold on your audience, too! Why, you almost persuaded me there was something in it!"

Tennelly tried to finish his sentence in lighter vein, but the feeling was in his voice yet.

Courtland gripped his hand and looked his yearning with a sudden light of joy and hope: "If you only would, Nelly! It's been the thing I've longed for—!"

"Not yet!" said Tennelly, almost pulling his hand away from the detaining grasp. "Some time, perhaps, but not now! I've too much else on hand! I must beat it now! Man alive! Do you know what time it is? See you soon again!" Tennelly was off in a whirl of words.

"Almost thou persuadest me!" Had some one whispered the words behind him as he went?

COURTLAND stood looking after him till the door closed, then he turned and stepped to the window again. He was so long standing there, motionless, that Pat went at last and touched him on the shoulder.

"Say, pard," he said, in a low, gruff voice. "I'm nothing but a roughneck, I know, and not worth much at that, but if it's any satisfaction to you to know you've bowled a bum like me over to His side, why I'm with you!"

Courtland turned and grasped his hand, throwing the other arm about Pat's shoulder. "It sure is, Pat, old boy," he said, eagerly. "It's the greatest thing ever! Thanks! I needed that just now! I'm all in!"

They stood so for some minutes with their arms across each other's shoulders, looking out of the window to the city lying sorrowful, forgetful, sinful before them; down to the street below, where Tennelly hastened on to win his Gila; up to the quiet, wise old stars above.

CHAPTER XXVIII

TENNELLY did not come back as he had promised. Instead he wrote a gay little note to tell of his engagement to Gila. They would wait a year perhaps before announcing it to the world, but he wanted Courtland to know. In an added line at the bottom he said: "That was a great old speech you made the other night, Court. I haven't forgotten it yet. Your reference to Marshall was a cracker-jack! The faculty ought to have heard it."

Courtland read it wearily, closed his eyes for a minute, passed his hand over his brow, then handed the note over to Pat. The understanding between the two was very deep and tender now.

Pat read without comment, but the frown on his brow matched the set of his big jaw. When he spoke again it was to tell Courtland of the job he had been offered as athletic coach in a preparatory school in the same neighborhood with the theological seminary where Courtland had decided to study. Courtland listened without hearing and smiled wearily. He was entering his Gethsemane. Neither one of them slept much that night.

In the early dawning Courtland arose, dressed, and silently stole out of the room, down through the sleeping city, out to the country, where he had gone once before when trouble struck him. It seemed to him he must get away to breathe, he must go where he could be alone with God.

Pat understood. He only waited till Courtland was gone to fling on his clothes in a hurry and be after him. He had noted from the window the direction taken, and guessed where he would be.

ON and on walked Courtland with the burning sorrow in his soul, his feet finding their way without apparent direction from his mind; out to the stream, and the path where wild flowers and grasses had strewn the ground in springtime; gay now with white and purple asters. But Courtland saw nothing but the dark of his Gethsemane. For every nodding goldenrod and saucy purple aster was but a bright-winged thought to him to bring back the saucy, lovely face of Gila. She belonged now to another. He had not realized before how fully he had chosen, how lost she was to him, until another, and that his best friend, had taken her for his own. He realized that he had always hoped, even when he walked away from her, that she would find the Christ and one day they would come together again.

He gained at last the rock-bound refuge where he knelt once before. Pat, coming later crept softly up, assured himself that all was well, then crept away to wait. What those hours of waiting meant to Pat might perhaps be found written in the lives of some of the boys in that school where he coached athletics the next winter. But what they meant to Courtland will only be found written in the records on high.

SOME time a little after noon there came a peace to Courtland's troubled soul.

He stood up, looked abroad, and knew that there was strength for all his need. It was then Pat came with refreshment like a ministering angel.

When they got back to the city that evening there was a note from Bonnie. She sent a check on the funeral account. She was well and happy. She was teaching the grammar-school where Stephen Marshall used to study when he was a little boy, and giving music lessons in the afternoons. She would soon be able to pay back everything she owed and to do a daughter's share in the home where she was treated like an own child.

There was a ring so fresh and true in this little letter, that he could but recognize it. He sighed and thought how strange it was that he should almost resent it, coming as it did in contrast with Gila's falseness.

He answered Bonnie's note in a day or two with a cordial one, returning her check, assuring her that everything was fully paid, and expressing his pleasure that she had found a real home and congenial work. Then he dismissed her from his mind.

A WEEK later he went to the seminary, and Pat accompanied him as far as the preparatory school, where he was to enter upon his duties as athletic coach.

Courtland found the atmosphere of the seminary quite different from college. The men were older. They had chosen definitely their work in the world. Their talk was of things ecclesiastical. The happenings of the day were spoken of with reference to the religious world. It was a new viewpoint in every sense of the word. And yet he was disappointed that he did not find a more spiritual atmosphere among the young men who were studying for the ministry. There was much worldly talk. There was a great deal of church gossip about churches and ministers; what this one was paid and what that one got; the chances of a man being called to a city church when he was just out of the seminary. It was the way his father had talked when he told him he wanted to study theology. It turned him sick at heart to hear them. It seemed so far from the attitude a servant of the Lord should have. He mentioned it one day bitterly to Pat when he came over to spend a spare evening, as he frequently did.

"I think you're wrong," said Pat, in his queer, abrupt way. "From what I can figure there was only a few of those guys got around Christ and knew what he really was! You didn't suppose it would be any different now, did you? Guess you'll find it that way everywhere, only a few real folks in any gang!"

The Woods in Winter

By MARGARET E. SANGSTER

THE woods in early winter, when the snow is on the pine, and the sunshine, falling lace-like, has a frosty, silver shine; when your footsteps crunch and echo as you walk your lonely way—oh, the woods in early winter at the morning time of day!

There is romance in the forest, it comes thrilling on the air; there's a mystery and silence that seem growing everywhere; there's a sense of bold adventure; there's a throb of strength asleep; there's a hint of hidden power where the drifted snow lies deep. There's a vagrant voice that calls you, that seems begging you to stray through the woods in early winter at the morning time of day.

How the balsam trees seem standing soldier-like in solemn rows! How the hemlock branches quiver underneath their cloak of snows! How the birch trees glimmer frigid, while the oaks stand stanch and tall! How the whiteness of the winter is a coverlet for all!

I HAVE worn my woolen mittens, I've a cap upon my head, and my heavy knitted sweater that is warmly made and red; and my shoes are stout for walking and my heart is young and gay as I seek the woods in winter at the morning time of day.

There are cares, perhaps, behind me, but the day is chill and new, and the frost upon the thicket is like jeweled fairy dew; and the murmur of the brooklet in the little frozen glen is the voice of nature calling, calling, "Welcome home again!" And my feet, that had been tired, that had dragged upon the road, are as light as errant childhood that has never known life's load. I've a wish to shout a greeting, I've a wish to call and sing, so that all the drowsy echoes may awake and chime and ring. There's a sparkle in the sunlight—I can feel it in my eyes—and my soul has caught the sparkle of a dream that never dies; and the city, half-forgotten, lies a century away from the woods in early winter at the morning time of day.

There's a sudden subtle stirring where the underbrush is thick; there's the snap of something stepping on a brittle bit of stick; and I stand, a breathless statue, and I wait until I see a little rabbit staring through the icy twigs at me. And a warmth throbs through my pulses, and I wish that I might speak to the little furry creatures of the wood and hill and creek. And I wish that I might tell them of the fellowship I know for the life that God has given to a forest bound in snow.

Every crumpled leaf seems vanquished, but I know that in each tree the sap is running swiftly as the life blood leaps in me. Every fern that, brown and deathlike, lies a shadow by the stream, will be green again next summer, when December is a dream. And I know that every flower that seems withered up and cold will have early springtime blossoms when the winter's tale is told. I can see a scene before me of the woods in fragrant May as I walk the woods in winter at the morning time of day.

AH, the noontime sun comes warming through the heavy boughs between, and the snow is like a prism, touched with rose and blue and green; and my heart grows ever lighter and my step is brisk and fast, and I feel that I am victor—that a battleground is past; and I feel that small temptations have been swept into a mist, just as ice turns into water where a sunbeam's lips have kissed; and I feel renewed and strengthened, and I hold my head up high, and I know a sense of kinship with the proudly arching sky. And I put all doubts behind me, and I put all hopes before, and the woodland stands before me like a fair, half-opened door.

Ah, too soon the shadows lengthen, and too soon the sunset creeps like a ruddy-tinted cover toward the place where daytime sleeps; and I turn about to hurry past the snowy freighted pines; past the hemlocks and the cedars where the browning ivy twines; past the glen that still is calling in a silver voice and low; but the night comes very swiftly, and the wayfarer must go!

Oh, the woods in early winter at the twilight time of day, when the trees against the snowbanks glimmer shadowy and gray; when the air is hushed and quiet and the wind is softly still, and the echo is a sleep-song from the dusky far-off hill; when you feel alone and tiny in a world of coming dark, and the stars, just lightly shining, are your only guiding spark; when the farmhouse in the hollow seems a haven built for rest, and the little forest creatures are asleep on nature's breast; when the ice-touched twigs seem ghostlike as they crackle, bow, and sway—oh, the woods in early winter at the twilight time of day!

The woods in early winter when the snow is on the pine, and the star-light, falling lace-like, has a wistful silver shine; when you hurry through the silence and your footsteps brush the snow with a hesitating crackle . . . but you're singing as you go. For the Father's hand is near you in the silence of the pines, in the crackle of the snowfall, in each little star that shines. Through the violet-tinted distance comes a thrill that seems to pray. . . . Ah, the woods in early winter at the twilight time of day!

"My Christmas list is all made up," said Mrs. Brown to her friend who had just dropped in.

"I wish mine were," replied the neighbor. "I'm so busy this year. If there were only a short cut to Christmas shopping!"

"There is," said Mrs. Brown. "It's simple as A B C. A trusted shopping guide helps me make my selections. We sit down together and I learn all about the new and desirable things. It's like taking a little journey to the metropolitan shopping districts without stirring from your chair."

"I follow this guide in all my shopping," continued Mrs. Brown. "I find I get invariable satisfaction when I do."

"A shopping guide!" quoth the neighbor. "Never heard of such a thing. Next time this valuable guide calls, I'd like—"

"Why, it's calling on you every week—I've seen it on your center-table. It's The Christian Herald!"

Are you using The Christian Herald as a shopping guide? You can safely do so, for anything advertised here is all it is claimed to be. It couldn't be here if it weren't.

The Advent of the Messiah

International Sunday School Lesson for December 23

Matt. 2:1-12

By REV. GEORGE D. ALLISON, Ph.D.

THE life of man can be portrayed under many figures of speech, and one of the richest of them all is to think of it as a quest. All the world is seeking, ever seeking, but the objects of the search differ as widely as the poles. These beautiful "Christmas Carols" of the Gospels are emblematic of the world's search at its best, the quest of the revelation of God. In Luke's story of the shepherds we have the glory of humility, the message of the angels coming unexpectedly to men engaged in the commonest of tasks. Instantly they recognize the opportunity and go to seek the Babe of Bethlehem. On the other hand, in Matthew's story, which we study today, we have the reward of devotion, for these Magi at last find it true that "he that seeketh findeth." Wise men are ever seekers.

Yes, the quests of life are many, but one quest alone is supremely worth while: the search for the divine. Win the quest for fame and it turns to ashes in your hands. Pursue pleasure and it brings satiety and cloying. As for money, how men seek it! but those that obtain are not superlatively happy. But the quest of the best, for the ideal, for God in human life, brings happiness or what is better than happiness, blessedness. Henry Van Dyke's "Other Wise Man" did not see the Manger Child, because delayed upon his way by deeds of Christlike service. Though he knew it not, he had achieved the Quest, he had ministered unto the Messiah, and at the end of the journey he heard Him saying, "Come ye blessed of my Father."

Following the Gleam

It was only the light of a star, but it led them to the long-sought King. It is the old, old lesson of the spiritual realm: no matter how little light you have, if you follow it faithfully you shall receive the greater glory beyond. He that willeth to do God's will shall understand the doctrine. Then follow the gleam, for it will brighten unto the perfect day. If you have faith as a mustard seed, use it, for the world hath need of it.

Legend pictures these wise men as kings who left their thrones and riches to seek the Redeemer. No sacrifice is too great to attain the Kingdom of God. How foolish was that young ruler who hugged his "great possessions," when he might have companied with Jesus as did the young John! He missed the quest, though he came into the very presence of the Messiah, seeking some good thing to do. Across the long and weary desert came these Magi, following the star. There is no road too long, no toil too weary, if we have but a glimpse of celestial light.

The night of war and sorrow is dark around us just now. Some are saying, "How can we keep Christmastide in 1917?" But the star of hope shines on. Keep Christmas like the wise men, following that light. We indeed have far more light than they to guide, and shall we falter? I have just been reading "A Student in Arms" by Donald Hankey and it has refreshed my spirit. I had been overburdened by tales of frightfulness, and now I get from the very trenches of Flanders a message of one who has met Christ there, face to face. He writes in his diary: "I have seen with the eyes of God. I have seen the vanity of the temporal and the glory of the eternal. I have despised comfort and honored pain. I have understood the victory of the Cross. O Death, where is thy sting?" Since then he has been killed in action. But who will doubt that he gained the great quest?

Finding in a Child the Hope of the World

If the Magi had not been wise, they would never have seen the Messiah in a baby. If Mary had really comprehended this, how devotedly would she have labored and taught! If the rulers in the Temple had recognized the Hope of Israel in the twelve-year-old from Nazareth, how eagerly they would have ministered to him! Yet today and always the hope of the world is in its child-life. Then you and I, fellow Sunday school teachers, what are we doing for Christ's ambassadors? For "whosoever receiveth one such little child in My name receiveth Me." After the war—and there will be an after the war—these youngsters of ours will try their hands at building the commonwealth of nations. Are they going to build on the One Foundation?

A "Giving" Christmas

Let us have in our Bible school this year a "giving" Christmas. Too often it has meant only receiving for the children. With such cries of anguish from Palestine, such world needs as we have just now, surely Christmas must be made more than a time of candies and oranges and fine clothes at a "Christmas entertainment." They do not so much want entertainment as we think. They want a share in Christ's work. So let the program be inspiring for sacrifice. Let the scholars offer "White Gifts for the King," of Self and Substance and Service. Teach them to give by offering a real chance to give.

So we read that the first Christmas was a giving Christmas. The seekers who had followed the star laid their best at the feet of the Lord. Yes, they gave gold, money. Strange as it may seem, this is frequently a marvelous gift. How odd it is that by going without some bit of luxury and simply writing a check, we can have an actual share in some wonderful, efficient ministry to the afflicted on the other side of the earth! Surely we ought to avail ourselves of the privilege. Yet I am sure there are some men and women who grumble about "so many appeals" who have not given to all combined as much as the older boys are promising to carry the Red Triangle to the front. What have you really done, friend? Total it up, and compare it with your possessions and your income. Are we giving gold, or are we doling out coppers?

If we teach older classes, emphasize this point. For now is the time for these young people to start lifelong habits of generosity, whether they share a meager allowance or make sacrifices out of a modest salary. Many a man would be further along on the quest of genuine happiness if he had learned to give without wincing when first he handled money of his own. And emphasize regular giving and proportionate giving, whether you believe in the tithe or not. It is not only at Christmas time that we give to those we love. If we would have a universal spirit of Christmas we must first have universal benevolence, and that means not merely well-wishing but giving.

LESSON FOR SUNDAY, DECEMBER 2, 1917—Nehemiah Rebuilds the Wall of Jerusalem

Golden Text. The Lord is my helper: I will not fear what man shall do unto me?—Hebrews 13 6

NEHEMIAH 4 1 23

1 But it came to pass, that when Sanballat heard that we builded the wall, he was wroth, and took great indignation, and mocked the Jews

2 And he spake before his brethren and the army of Samaria, and said, What do these feeble Jews? will they fortify themselves? will they sacrifice? will they make an end in a day? will they revive the stones out of the heaps of the rubbish which are burned?

3 Now Tobiah the Ammonite was by him, and he said, Even that which they build, if a fox go up, he shall even break down their stone wall

4 Hear, O our God, for we are despised and turn their reproach upon their own head, and give them for a prey in the land of captivity

5 And cover not their iniquity and let not their sin be blotted out from before thee for they have provoked thee to anger before the builders.

6 So built we the wall, and all the wall was joined together unto the half thereof for the people had a mind to work.

7 But it came to pass, that when Sanballat, and Tobiah, and the Arabians, and the Ammonites, and the Ashdodites, heard that the walls of Jerusalem were made up, and that the breaches began to be stopped, then they were very wroth

8 And conspired all of them together to come and to fight against Jerusalem, and to hinder it

9 Nevertheless we made our prayer unto our God and set a watch against them day and night, because of them

10 And Judah said, The strength of the bearers of burdens is decayed, and there is much rubbish, so that we are not able to build the wall

11 And our adversaries said, They shall not know, neither see, till we come in the midst among them and slay them and cause the work to cease.

12 And it came to pass that when the Jews which dwelt by them came, they said unto us ten times, From all places whence ye shall return unto us they will be upon you

13 Therefore set I in the lower places behind the wall, and on the higher places, I even set the people after their families with their swords, their spears, and their bows

14 And I looked, and rose up, and said unto the nobles, and to the rulers, and to the rest of the people, Be not ye afraid of them remember the Lord, which is great and terrible, and fight for your brethren, your sons, and your daughters your wives, and your houses.

15 And it came to pass, when our enemies heard that it was known unto us, and God had brought their counsel to nought, that we returned all of us to the wall, every one unto his work.

16 And it came to pass from that time forth, that the half of my servants wrought in the work and the other half of them held both the spears the shields, and the bows, and the habergeons, and the rulers were behind all the house of Judah

17 They which builded on the wall, and they that bare burdens, with those that laded, every one with one of his hands wrought in the work, and with the other hand held a weapon

18 For the builders, every one had his sword girded by his side and so builded And he that sounded the trumpet was by me

19 And I said unto the nobles and to the rulers, and to the rest of the people, The work is great and large, and we are separated upon the wall, one far from another

20 In what place therefore ye hear the sound of the trumpet, resort ye thither unto us our God shall fight for us

21 So we labored in the work and half of them held the spears from the rising of the morning till the stars appeared

22 Likewise at the same time said I unto the people, Let every one with his servant lodge within Jerusalem, that in the night they may be a guard to us and labor on the day

23 So neither I, nor my brethren, nor my servants nor the men of the guard which followed me none of us put off our clothes, saving that every one put them off for washing

110 The wicked have laid a snare for me yet I erred not from thy precepts.

111 Thy testimonies have I taken as a heritage for ever for they are the rejoicing of my heart.

112 I have inclined mine heart to perform thy statutes alway, even unto the end

LESSON FOR SUNDAY, DECEMBER 9, 1917—Ezra and Nehemiah Teach the Law

Golden Text. Thy word is a lamp unto my feet, and a light unto my path—Psalm 119 105

NEHEMIAH 8 1 12

1 And all the people gathered themselves together as one man into the street that was before the water gate, and they spake unto Ezra the scribe to bring the book of the law of Moses which the LORD had commanded to Israel

2 And Ezra the priest brought the law before the congregation both of men and women, and all that could hear with understanding, upon the first day of the seventh month

3 And he read therein before the street that was before the water gate from the morning until midday, before the men and the women and those that could understand and the ears of all the people were attentive unto the book of the law.

4 And Ezra the scribe stood upon a pulpit of wood, which they had made for the purpose, and beside him stood Mattithiah and Shema, and Anaiah, and Urijah, and Hilkiah, and Maaseiah, on his right hand and on his left hand, Pedaiah, and Mishael, and Malchiah, and Hashum, and Hashbadana, Zechariah, and Meshullam

5 And Ezra opened the book in the sight of all the people, (for he was above all the people,) and when he opened it, all the people stood up

6 And Ezra blessed the LORD the great God And all the people answered Amen, Amen with lifting up their hands and they bowed their heads, and worshipped the LORD with their faces to the ground

7 Also Jeshua, and Bani, and Sherebiah, Jamin, Akkub, Shabbethai, Hodijah, Maaseiah, Kelita, Azariah, Jozabad, Hanan, Pelaiah, and the Levites, caused the people to understand the law and the people stood in their place

8 So they read in the book in the law of God distinctly and gave the sense, and caused them to understand the reading

9 And Nehemiah, which is the Tirshatha, and Ezra the priest the scribe, and the Levites that taught the people, said unto all the people, This day is holy unto the LORD your God, mourn not, nor weep For all the people wept, when they heard the words of the law

10 Then he said unto them, Go your way, eat the fat, and drink the sweet, and send portions unto them for whom nothing is prepared for this day is holy unto our LORD neither be ye sorry, for the joy of the LORD is your strength

11 So the Levites stilled all the people, saying, Hold your peace, for the day is holy, neither be ye grieved

12 And all the people went their way to eat, and to drink, and to send portions, and to make great mirth, because they had understood the words that were declared unto them

Nehemiah Enforces Law of the Sabbath

NEHEMIAH 13 15 22

15 In those days saw I in Judah some treading wine presses on the sabbath, and bringing in sheaves, and lading asses, as also wine, grapes, and figs and all manner of burdens, which they brought into Jerusalem on the sabbath day and I testified against them in the day wherein they sold victuals

16 There dwelt men of Tyre also therein, which brought fish and all manner of ware, and sold on the sabbath unto the children of Judah, and in Jerusalem

17 Then I contended with the nobles of Judah, and said unto them What evil thing is this that ye do, and profane the sabbath day?

18 Did not your fathers thus, and did not our God bring all this evil upon us, and upon this city? yet ye bring more wrath upon Israel by profaning the sabbath

19 And it came to pass, that when the gates of Jerusalem began to be dark before the sabbath, I commanded that the gates should be shut, and charged that they should not be opened till after the sabbath, and some of my servants set I at the gates, that there should no burden be brought in on the sabbath day

20 So the merchants and sellers of all kind of ware lodged without Jerusalem once or twice.

21 Then I testified against them, and said unto them, Why lodge ye about the wall? if ye do so again, I will lay hands on you From that time forth came they no more on the sabbath.

22 And I commanded the Levites that they should cleanse themselves, and that they should come and keep the gates, to sanctify the sabbath day Remember me, O my God, concerning this also, and spare me according to the greatness of thy mercy

International Bible Readings

So in International Bible Readings you will have a book valuable in itself—a daily source of inspiration for the whole family. It should lead everyone not now a daily Bible reader to read a portion each day. It should be the easy means of leading many to acquire the habit of daily Bible communion. Sunday School scholars and teachers will find here the Lessons and Daily Home Bible Readings given word for word—not simply indicated by references—and therefore they will read their portions more frequently and with greater care. International Bible Readings cannot but be a help and inspiration for all.

Just How to Compete

There is nothing hard to understand about the National Bible Picture Study plan—it is simply a way of studying Bible verses by the pictorial method.

Thirty pictures appear in the Christian Herald—Pictures Nos. 4 and 5 are published today.

Participants save these pictures, and compare each one with the list of about 2,000 Bible verses, which are printed in full in the Reference Book, International Bible Readings. They select from this list the verses that "fit" the pictures best—that is, which describe best what the pictures show. Can you think of a verse that might fit Picture No. 4, and another that might fit Picture No. 5?

Having chosen the most fitting verses, participants write them down in the Answer Book, which is pictured here, and send it in to us.

Those who submit the best verses for the 30 pictures, according to the decisions of a committee of eminent Judges, will be awarded the 1,001 cash prizes, totaling $5,000.00, listed below.

Competition without expense is possible as stated in the rules, which will be sent free on request. Everyone is offered the complete, convenient Outfit for competing, too, as explained below. When requested all back pictures will be included without extra cost with each Outfit ordered. You will enjoy the Study—don't delay starting it!

Questions and Answers

R. T. C., Syracuse, N. Y. Regarding the use of concrete in the construction of vessels, much has been said and a little accomplished in this country during the last few years. It is interesting, therefore, to observe that in France considerable progress is being made in this direction. In order to reduce the consumption and importation of timber, large barges and canal boats are being built of reinforced concrete. The merits of such vessels are known. They are fireproof, can be constructed quickly by unskilled laborers, have low maintenance cost, will withstand hard usage, will not rust or rot, and are as easily towed and handled as wooden craft. Reinforced concrete construction is supposed to have first been employed in the building of small boats. A Frenchman in 1849 built and patented a concrete rowboat.

W. J. H., Findlay, O. The hookworm disease is so common in warm countries that probably today several hundred millions of people are its victims. In some parts of China 50 per cent. of the population are afflicted by it, while among farmers and gardeners the proportion is sometimes 80 or 90 per cent. Northern Siam has just as much hookworm, while certain parts of India, Java, the Malay States, Japan and Korea are similarly afflicted. It is widespread in some of our southern states and in Central and South America.

S. R. S., Sandusky, Ohio. Eskimo and Siberian dogs can travel forty-five miles on the ice in five hours, and there is one case on record in which a team of Eskimo dogs traveled six and one-half miles in twenty-eight minutes. English setters and pointers hunt at the rate of eighteen to nineteen miles an hour, and they can maintain the speed for at least two hours. Foxhounds are extraordinarily swift, as is proved by the fact that a dog of this breed once beat a thoroughbred horse, covering four miles in six and one-half minutes. Greyhounds are the swiftest of all four-footed creatures, and their speed may be regarded as equal to that of carrier pigeons. English greyhounds which are carefully selected and which are used for coursing are able to cover at full gallop a space between eighteen and twenty-three yards every second. It is said that a hare at its greatest speed never goes faster than at the rate of eighteen yards a second.

Mrs. R. M. C., Shelbyville, Ind. Dearborn county, Indiana, claims to have the highest per capita subscriptions to the second Liberty Loan outside the county of New York. It was admittedly the leading county in the Chicago district, and surpassed the record made in the first loan, when it was the second county in Indiana in percentage of over-subscriptions. The most surprising feature of this is that it is a poor county, in the hilly district along the Ohio river, which has been much less prosperous of recent years than the corn belt flat lands to the north, and that nearly half of the population is of German blood. With a population of 21,396, the county subscribed $1,069,300 to the second loan, a per capita record of something over $50.

P. S., Richland, Mich. Who destroyed the great Alexandrian Library?

The greater part of the library, which contained the collected literatures of Rome, Greece, India and Egypt, was contained in the Museum at Alexandria. During the siege of this city by Julius Cæsar, this part of the library was burned. It was afterward replaced by the Pergamos collection, presented to Cleopatra by Mark Antony. The other part of the library was kept in the temple of Serapis, and was destroyed together with the temple during the reign of Theodosius.

W. H. H., Poughkeepsie, N. Y. "In a recent issue of your paper I have read a deeply interesting and instructive editorial on 'National Sins,' called forth by a letter from a friend in the South. Both the letter and the editorial comment have touched a spot in our national need. We need to get right with God. There is little of the 'doing justly, loving mercy and walking humbly before God' in either our national, ecclesiastical or individual life today. National life is but a reflection of the composite life of the citizenry. The life of the citizens is indexed to the standard of the churches. The national sin is great, but the church sin is greater and the individual sin greatest. No nation is better than its churches, no church better than its members, and no member of the church can be better than his religious life. But the remedy for these evils spoken of is not in praying. One is not heard for his much speaking in prayer. And there comes a time when prayer must give place to action. 'Quit your crying unto me' and—move forward—forward in the line of obedience—forward toward the goal He has set, seeking those things which are above, keeping first the kingdom of God and his righteousness. These are notes in the call. These are marks of the prize of the high calling of God in Christ Jesus. To do unto others as we want them to do unto us, includes doing unto God as we want—aye, as he will, do unto us. To wrong one's neighbor, God counts as a sin against himself. Sins for which forgiveness has not been sought stand against us in the judgment, and those wrongs which we refuse to forgive in others who seek such forgiveness prevent our own forgiveness with God. Ministers who preach the truth as it is in Jesus must lay the ax at the root of the tree. It is not enough to trim a few branches or spray the leaves. And the minister who does this will share the fate of Jesus and the apostles. He, too, will be crucified, even though it may not be upon a literal cross. Count the cost! Who will take up his cross and, in daily self-denial, follow Jesus?"

John R. King, Past Commander-in-Chief of the Grand Army of the Republic, writes from Baltimore, Md.: "¶ have been a subscriber to the Christian Herald for more than twenty-five years and value it very highly. My indignation was greatly aroused by reading in the inquiry column a letter from H. A. B., Arlington, Wis., which is a slander on the men who fought half a century ago to save this nation. He says, anent your 'Let's Drive Booze Out of Camp,' "We know of the booze practice during the war of 1861–1864, when Uncle Sam filled canteens instead of furnishing food, while many soldiers survived the war and were ever after habitual drunkards." An elder brother of the writer, who was in the Sherman march, said: 'For three days during this time, our canteens were filled with whisky; no hardtack or food of any kind, while along the road lay men dead from sheer starvation and exhaustion.' In a service of three years in the Army of the Potomac, '62 to '65, I never knew of an instance when whisky was issued to soldiers, save for a short period in '63 or '64, in the malarial district of Virginia—a gill a day with quinine placed in it. Half of the men would refuse it. H. A. B. does not give the name of that brother who is credited with that fairy tale of Sherman's march, his company or regiment. Any one with common sense would stamp it at first sight as a lie pure and simple. Of what use would a drunken army be to General Sherman? I have been a close student of the War of the Rebellion, and I must confess I have never read or heard of the incident referred to. As you have given space to this H. A. B., I shall expect the same courtesy in denial. This in justice to the memory of my comrades who have answered the last call, and to the small remnant who are calmly waiting for 'Lights Out.'"

B. R., McKeesport, Pa. The subject is controversial.

E. M. B., Cochington, Ga. Old publications are not desired for the camps. The instructions are that only current publications can be accepted. Write to the Y. M. C. A. Army Work Secretary, New York, as to the books you mention.

Miss V., Birmingham, N. Y. What should a person do who recognizes a duty, yet has not the moral courage to carry it out?

There is but one source of strength—to pray for the courage needed. God gives strength to any of his weak children who seek it in prayer. Some have even been enabled to lay down their lives for his sake. The apostle Paul gives directions (Eph. 6 : 10-18) for such cases. God has especial care for the timid ones; and if they make the effort in his strength, they discover to their surprise that a courage and endurance not their own is supplied to them. They have bread to eat that the world knows not of. The weakest is strong when he has Omnipotence at his back.

W. J. C., Knoxville, Tenn. Who is the person described in II Thess. 2 : 3,4, as the "man of sin"?

The same potentate whom Daniel describes (7 : 25), who is called in Revelation the Beast, and in John's epistles the Antichrist—a personality to be fully developed in the days immediately preceding Christ's second coming. He is a king who will arrogate to himself the power to speak as God, and to govern the world. Many have thought that the Pope, claiming infallibility, was really this potentate, but Antichrist will more probably be a secular power, to whom the Pope will give his support.

Bible Student, Kenosha, Wis. Was Herodias married to King Herod?

She first married Herod surnamed Philip, a son of Mariamne, and therefore her uncle. Then she left him to marry Herod Antipas, her step-uncle, who already had a wife. There was no question of marriage in the sacred sense; all the circumstances in the case were immoral. It was the reproof of this crime which brought her enmity on John the Baptist.

Better than a mustard plaster

Once when grandma's joints commenced to pringle and twinge, she used to go to the mustard pot and make a mustard plaster. Now she goes to Musterole and gets relief, but does without the blister and the plaster, too!

My, how good that Musterole feels when you rub it in gently over that lame back and those sore muscles. First you feel the gentle tingle, then the delightful, soothing coolness that reaches in the twinging joints or stiff, sore muscles.

It penetrates to the heart of the congestion. This is because it is made of oil of Mustard and other home simples. And the heat generated by Musterole will not blister.

On the contrary the peculiarity of Musterole lies in the fact that shortly it gives you such a cool, relieved feeling all about the twingey part.

And Musterole usually brings the relief while you are rubbing it on. Always keep a jar handy.

Many doctors and nurses recommend Musterole. 30c and 60c jars—$2.50 hospital size.

Sunday School Methods

By FRANK L. BROWN, Joint General Secretary World's Sunday School Association

PLEASE give me some ideas about a church Christmas entertainment, some nice plays or any kind of a new way of entertaining. I am a Sunday school teacher, and my class of girls are in age from eight to ten.—F. E.

A. There are many varieties of Christmas entertainments, samples of which you can procure of any denominational house or of the Goodenough & Woglom Company, 122 Nassau Street, New York. For scholars of your age, or a little older, the following little booklets will be suggestive:

"Christmas at the Cross Roads" (Elizabeth F. Guptell); "A Feast in the Wilderness" (A. Humboldt), March Brothers, Lebanon, Ohio; "Christmas Stars" (Lettie Sterling), The Penn Publishing Company, Philadelphia, Pa.; "A Santa Claus Frolic," "Merry Christmas of the Old Woman Who Lived in a Shoe," "Santa's Surprise," "A Rag Doll Party," "Maids of All Nations," "Half an Hour with a Giant," Walter H. Baker & Co., Boston, Mass.; and "The Good Samaritan" (H. Elizabeth Edland), Methodist Book Concern, 150 Fifth Avenue, New York. This last play was recently written especially for this coming Christmas to show the needs of the starving Syrian and Armenian children at this time.

Q. Should we not use older teachers in the Sunday school, rather than young people who have not the necessary experience?—Mrs. M. S. N.

A. All old teachers who amount to anything probably began to teach when they were young. I would rather have a young teacher with enthusiasm and love, even without experience, than a teacher who was far removed from youth of spirit. No; give the young people a chance. They may stumble a bit, but they will be faithful, and if you can help them with a few good books and a smile and a word of encouragement and a time of prayer, they will grow to surprise you.

Q. Can you tell me of any Bible Study aids that will be helpful for a teacher of a Bible class of girls?—G. R.

A. I would suggest you write to the National Young Women's Christian Association, 600 Lexington Avenue, New York, for their booklet giving list of Bible Courses for young women. Also procure a copy of The Sunday School Officers' Manual (Brown), which outlines a number of Training Courses for young people to prepare them for leadership in Social Service, Evangelism, Missionary and other lines.

Q. Will you give me names of two or three of the best teachers' helps on the Uniform Sunday school lessons.—E. E. F.

A. "Peloubet's and Tarbell's Notes," "Gist of the Lessons" (Forrey), and Dr. Pell's "Teaching Notes."

Young People's Topics for December 23

The Birth of Love

Epworth League Topic. Luke 2 : 8–14; John 3 : 16; 15 : 9; 13 : 1

IN Christ the love of God is made manifest, revealed through the sacrifice of the only begotten Son. Love is only revealed through sacrifice, but sacrifice because of love loses the element of voluntary loss which gives the word its customary meaning and becomes a blessed opportunity, sought for and rejoiced in. God so loved the world that he was glad to send his Son to share its sorrows and to die for its sins, and Jesus so shared the Father's love that he came gladly, endured the shame and the pain of the cross, that all men through him might know the Father's love and be reconciled through his sacrifice. Thus Christmas may be called the birthday of love, since it was the beginning of the earthly manifestation of that heavenly love of which all human loves are but faint echoes. If, then, we have been born again through Christ, we will be born to a deeper love for those for whom Christ died. We will be born to a love which can transmute sacrifice into opportunity.

Christmas Giving

Christian Endeavor and B. Y. P. U. Topics. Matt. 2 : 1–2

THE wise men, following the star, came at last to the manger-cradle of the Christ, and there they poured out their rich gifts, spices, jewels and precious metals. So we, when we have followed the Bethlehem star of God's love, find ourselves kneeling before the Babe of Bethlehem. But the wise men saw only the babe and believed the prophecy. For us the prophecy has been fulfilled, and the Baby is both the Messiah and the risen Saviour. Thus there is a double significance for us in Christmas giving, for through it we symbolize the giving of God's greatest gift to men, a Saviour from sin.

the unity of the Holy Universal Church, a sin displeasing to God on high, who is the Father of us all?

How can this sad breach be healed, and this distressing burden on the hearts of Christians be removed? Let us not dismiss it as impossible, as an ideal dream. For that would be to deny that God rules. This unity cannot be brought about by force. That produces but hypocrisy, cramped uniformity and mental slavery. Rome tried that on a colossal scale and failed, only making the breach far worse.

How then can Christian unity be attained? This is a very practical question at the present time. All the separated churches are discussing it. Every great church body has appointed a commission to consider it. And some time, no doubt, these commissions will come together in a world-conference. If, then, Church unity is in the air, by what means can Christians help it onward?

There are three ways by which to do this. First, search the Scriptures. It is in our Bibles that we will learn our Christian duty as to Church unity. When Christ there teaches us of the one Vine with many branches and of the one Shepherd with all the sheep in one fold; when Paul tells us that the Church is Christ's body, and that we all are members of that body; and when Peter shows the Church to be one holy temple built up of many living stones, we get a vivid idea of the sin of these schisms and divisions, which contradict the whole Scriptural teaching of the unity of the churches in their one Lord and Head.

Second, we should believe in, and work and pray for it. If we do not believe church unity possible, of course it will never come. That it is so great a thing and looks so impossible, should not discourage us. And when the hearts of Christians everywhere are set on this great end, and when they unite in Christ's great sacerdotal prayer, "that they all may be one, as thou, Father art in me, and I in thee, that they also may be one in us," then will this blessed consummation be at hand.

Finally, there will never be a reunion of our divided Christendom without charity. It will not come about by one denomination insisting absolutely on its doctrinal type and absorbing all the others. But each must meet the other on terms of full equality. In essentials nothing can be compromised; but on secondary differences, there must be mutual surrender. One motive must be supreme, the love of Christ, and the advancement and usefulness of his Holy Church. Putting from us, then, all indifference on the one hand, and all narrow bigotry on the other, let us work and pray that Christ's rent body be made one again, that the unhappy divisions in Zion be healed; that the charge of our text be realized.

REV. CHARLES M. SHELDON, D. D.
Author of "In His Steps"

LIFE is a story. Your life is. That's why you like a tale that lives. Some tales are written; some are forged upon the anvil of the author's necessities; some grow day by day—like life. Now and then an author lives the tale he writes. Now and then some rare author is able to weave into his tale the drama, the sorrow, the joy, the struggle, the failure, the success, the doubt, the faith of the life of men, and to weave them skilfully into a story so vivid that, as you read, you see its action filmed upon the screen of your mind.

But only one author of whom we know acts his stories. Charles M. Sheldon does. Every episode of

"HOWARD CHASE"
A NEW STORY BY
REV. CHARLES M. SHELDON, D. D.
which begins in this issue of the

was portrayed by the author before his Sunday evening congregations. Every dramatic climax, every incident has been tried on his sympathetic hearers. They found it good and only when they did was Dr. Sheldon willing to give it to the world. Thus this story lives as few do, for it has been lived and it vibrates with the vital force of real life. It is not wholly fiction. In fact, it is largely true, and its characters are only faintly camouflaged, so that old acquaintances might easily recognize in them the very human folks they once have known. But we aren't going to tell you the story here. We couldn't do it well enough.

Dr. Sheldon's new novel surpasses all of his previous works in thrilling human interest and moral power. "Howard Chase" is a church story, but intensely human and deals unsparingly with the follies and foibles of church members.

"Howard Chase" may eventually be published in book form, but subscribers to the Christian Herald will be able to read it without one cent of extra expense. Dr. Sheldon's new story alone is well worth the subscription price.

THIS STORY AN EXCELLENT XMAS GIFT

We sincerely hope that "Howard Chase" will be read not only by every member of the Christian Herald Family Circle, but that many readers will give their friends an opportunity to also enjoy this really interesting story by Dr. Sheldon.

An instalment of "Howard Chase" will be given each week in the Christian Herald. The first instalment will be found on another page of this issue.

The special offer noted below, gives every reader an opportunity to make a Xmas gift of the Christian Herald for 13 weeks at one half the regular subscription price. Begin the subscription with the December 12th issue, so that the recipient will be able to read Dr. Sheldon's new story. This special 13 weeks subscription is for new subscribers only.

Will there be a Victrola in your home this Christmas?

Will Santa Claus usher into your home on Christmas morning the artistic Genius of all the world—the singers, the instrumentalists, the composers, the comedians who rule as the monarchs of Art and Laughter?

Caruso, Alda, Calvé, De Luca, Farrar, Galli-Curci, Gluck, Hempel, Homer, Kreisler, Martinelli, McCormack, Melba, Ruffo, Schumann-Heink, Scotti, Tetrazzini, Victor Herbert, Harry Lauder, Sousa—these are names that promise you the greatest music and entertainment that the world has to offer. All these illustrious artists—and many more—make records exclusively for the Victor.

The Victrola is the supreme gift—enjoyed by all the family every day in the year.

There are Victors and Victrolas in great variety of styles from $10 to $400, and there are Victor dealers in every city in the world who will gladly demonstrate them and play any music you wish to hear.

"Victrola" is the Registered Trade-mark of the Victor Talking Machine Company designating the products of this Company only. The use of the word Victrola upon or in the promotion or sale of any other Talking Machine or Phonograph products is misleading and illegal.

Questions and Answers

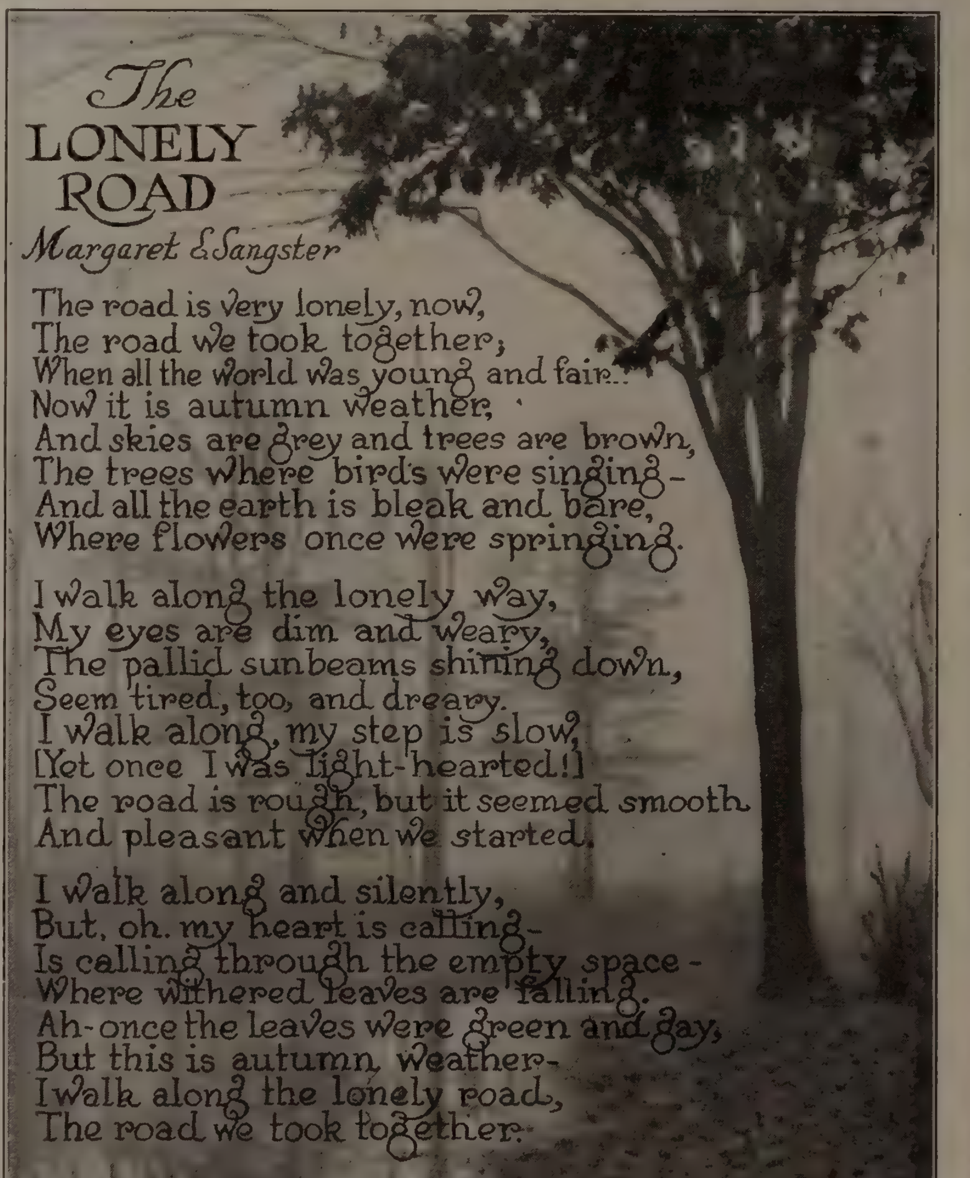
MRS. V. C. F., Phœnix, Ariz. There were three temples. The first was originally planned by King David, who meditated building a place in which the ark might be permanently placed. The prophet Nathan, though at first encouraging the idea, was later instructed to tell David that such a work was inappropriate for a warrior, and thus the actual continuation fell to the lot of Solomon. The first temple remained the center of public worship for all the Israelites only until the death of Solomon, after which ten tribes forsook this sanctuary. It was destroyed by Nebuchadnezzar (B. C. 588). The second temple was commenced after the Jews (B. C. 536) had obtained permission from Cyrus to colonize their native land: but it was not until B. C. 520 that work actually progressed on it. This temple was completed B. C. 516, and was pillaged several times, until finally it was partially destroyed by Herod the Great, B. C. 63. The third temple was probably not an entirely new one, but a rebuilding and renovating of the second. Herod, desiring to ingratiate himself with the church party, undertook to repair the second temple and to raise a new one where necessary. This work was commenced B. C. 21, and was finished by priests and Levites in one year and a half, while the courts and outbuildings took eight years more to complete. It was this third and last temple that was the scene of the final struggle of the Jews against Rome, A. D. 70.

Mr. L. R. H., Hooks Mills, W. Va. On the division of the land of Canaan among the children of Israel it developed that the descendants of Joseph, to wit, the Ephraimites and the tribe of Manasseh, were given each a portion, thus giving to the part of Joseph two portions, whereas his brothers' descendants received but one apiece. The explanation is this: on his deathbed, Jacob adopted Joseph's sons, Ephraim and Manasseh, as his own (Heb. 11 : 25). The reason for the adoption was to give to Joseph's descendants the benefits of the birthright which Reuben had forfeited by his crime (Gen. 49 : 4). This birthright carried with it a double portion of the inheritance, the priesthood and the kingdom. Thus Joseph's share was doubled, and Ephraim and Manasseh, as Joseph's descendants and as heirs of Jacob by adoption, received each an allotted portion, as forming two distinct tribes in Israel.

Mrs. H. McC., Wichita, Kan. We cannot at this time say whether Armageddon is near or has commenced. While it would of course, be desirable to have all the churches open daily for prayer and meditation, it may be impracticable, in certain cases, to do so. But that fact should not deprive us of our opportunity for prayer and meditation. Our Lord advises us to enter our closet for communion with him (Matt. 6 : 6) and tells us to "pray without ceasing." He implies that we are to be in contact with the Divine mind at any and all times, no matter where we might happen to be or how engaged. We think that whereas there may be some pulpits that shun the mention of immorality, there are many thousands whence these sins are condemned and warned against. We agree with you in your commendation of the Y. M. C. A. work. It is rendering valiant service in the right direction. All prosperity for and God's blessing on it!

R. H., Edmeston, N. Y. The evangelist (Luke 3 : 16: Matt. 3 : 11) uses the phrase, baptism by fire, figuratively. Christ himself did not baptize, as did John and the apostles, but as baptism is a washing, a cleansing, and thus a renewing rite, so the baptism by fire and the Holy Ghost, which John attributed to Christ, is the peculiar cleansing and renewing process which He instituted by his preaching and teaching. The symbol of purification by fire runs through the Gospel, and the cleansing power of the Holy Ghost is too well recognized to demand any new proof. This then is what is meant: Christ instituted the new order of things by means of which all that is bad in the contrite heart is burned away, and the Holy Ghost, entering into the heart, cleanses and purifies it.

J. A. M., McLeansboro, Ill. The sleeping saints who were raised after the resurrection of the Saviour, we are told in Matt. 27 : 53, "went into the Holy City and appeared unto many." This, it has been suggested by some commentators, was in order that they might testify of Jesus' resurrection, and that no doubt concerning it might be permitted to lie in the minds of his followers.



The LONELY ROAD

Margaret E. Sangster

The road is very lonely, now,
The road we took together;
When all the world was young and fair...
Now it is autumn weather,
And skies are grey and trees are brown,
The trees where birds were singing-
And all the earth is bleak and bare,
Where flowers once were springing.

I walk along the lonely way,
My eyes are dim and weary,
The pallid sunbeams shining down,
Seem tired, too, and dreary.
I walk along, my step is slow,
[Yet once I was light-hearted!]
The road is rough, but it seemed smooth
And pleasant when we started.

I walk along and silently,
But, oh, my heart is calling-
Is calling through the empty space-
Where withered leaves are falling.
Ah-once the leaves were green and gay,
But this is autumn weather-
I walk along the lonely road,
The road we took together.

Mrs. F. M. K., Miami, Fla., apropos of the sending of cigarettes to the young soldiers, writes: "I have been surprised that there has not been more protest. Many mothers' hearts are sore on the subject. I am a Kansas woman, belonging to a state where our boys are kept from such things. . . . Some one has made a cigarette to say:

"'I am not much of a mathematician,

"'But
I can add to a youth's nervous troubles,
I can subtract from his physical energy,
I can multiply his aches and pains,
I can divide his mental powers,
I can take interest from his work, and discount his chances for success.'"

Mrs. N. J. R., Booster, Ark. 1. As has been repeatedly explained in the Mail-Bag, God tempts no man. It is wrong for any dissatisfied soul to imagine that our heavenly Father is the author of man's troubles, in making him yield to temptation. Trial and testing, however, he does permit to come even to those he loves, when these serve a good purpose in the strengthening and developing of Christian character; yet, even here, we have the assurance that he will not permit us to be tried beyond our strength. The real tempter is the evil spirit within the heart of man, and the evil influences about us. In the unregenerate heart, and sometimes even in the spiritually awakened, the battle may be a fierce one, and it is well for us not to trust in our own strength, but to summon heavenly aid. Bunyan tells how even Christian and Faithful, in their journey, passed through the Valley of Temptation and were safeguarded in answer to prayer.

George H. Terry, Millington, N. J., writes: "As a veteran of the Civil War and one who was with Sherman all the way through, I desire to say I never saw a soldier with a canteen filled with whisky given by the Commissary Department: neither did I ever see a soldier dead by the roadside from starvation. These things were an utter impossibility. From Atlanta to the sea and through South and North Carolina whisky was issued to us just twice—about two tablespoonfuls each time. Rations were light, but we did not starve."

Reader, Grafton, W Va. "A call for a national prayer day should be headed with the promises: 'Whatsoever ye shall ask in my name, that will I do. Ask and ye shall receive.' The people of this nation need to be taught to pray. . . . It seems clearly evident that God is allowing this war to be to purify and cleanse the nations from their unrighteous and wicked doings. The sooner all the nations yield to God, the sooner the war will come to an end." (There is no such passage in the Bible as that concerning which you ask in your other question. It may possibly be found in some of the apocryphal books, however.)

Mrs. N. H. W., Hudson Falls, N. Y. 1. What are the relationships of the present rulers of Europe, including the ex-Czar, to the late Queen Victoria? 2. Whose mother was daughter of Christian IX of Denmark? 3. Give names of the parents of King George, the ex-Czar, and Kaiser William.

1. The Kaiser is grandson of Queen Victoria and cousin of King George of England. The ex-Czar is nephew of Queen Dowager Alexandra and cousin of King George. The queen of Spain is granddaughter of Queen Victoria and niece of King George. The queen of Norway is granddaughter of Queen Victoria and sister of King George. The king of Norway is nephew of Dowager Queen Alexandra and cousin of King George. The king of Denmark is brother to the king of Norway and therefore also cousin to King George. 2 and 3. King George of England is son of the late King Edward and Alexandra, daughter of King Christian IX of Denmark. The ex-Czar is son of the late Czar Alexander III and Dagmar, daughter of Christian IX. The Kaiser is son of Frederick III of Germany and Victoria, daughter of the late Queen Victoria of England.

This is not the floral season, and no one can accuse us of throwing bouquets; so we feel justified in giving space to this outspoken letter from a reader in Greenfield, Ohio:

"We are writing this for the express purpose of telling you how very highly we value your paper. Of the twenty-three publications that reach us regularly, none is accorded such a gracious welcome as the Herald. It is the first paper we read in the morning, and the last one before retiring. It helps equip us for the battles and trials of the day, and keeps before our mind the blessings of God while we are pursuing the secular news in its columns. We venture to say it is quite forcibly bringing the Word of God to many who regard the out-and-out denominational religious paper as rather uninteresting for constant reading. It is the only publication we have ever seen that so charmingly presents the things of this world and of the world beyond. No matter how much good literature one may take, we do not think the list complete without the Herald. We would like to see it reach every home in America. For, to read it means a better man or a better woman; higher ideals; a nobler life.

"Your efforts to produce such a wholesome publication are certainly to be commended. "WILLIS O. C. ELLIS."

V. H., New Paltz, N. Y. Cider, as soon as it begins to ferment, becomes intoxicating. Therefore it is included in the pledge as belonging to the category of intoxicating liquors.

L. V. W., Mount Kisco, N. Y. We have seen the so-called prophecy of Brother Johannes, said to have been made in 1600. It clearly belongs to the class of doubtful documents, the authenticity of it being seriously open to question. The trouble with "prophecies" or predictions of this sort is that no one ever hears about them until the event has happened.

Mrs. L. W., Germantown, Pa. Yes, the self-denial pledges suggested by the Food Administration are now familiar to the American public. "Meatless Tuesday" and "wheatless Wednesday" are nation-wide weekly fixtures in countless homes and in many hotels, restaurants and dining-cars. The Food Administration states that ninety per cent. of the best hotels are helping the conservation movement. One big chain of restaurants reports a saving of 14,000 pounds of meat every "meatless Tuesday," while a single metropolitan hotel saves 2,000 pounds of meat on that same day every week, and five barrels of flour on "wheatless Wednesdays." Sea foods and poultry are served in place of beef, mutton and pork; and rye-bread and corn-bread make acceptable substitutes for wheat-bread. The grand aggregate of a single year's saving in these two staples, meat and wheat, will surprise every one when it is announced.

Mrs. E. S. T., Siloam Springs, Ark. Your kindly letter is appreciated. The case you mention is one concerning which we cannot advise. Let us hope, however, that there may still be a way open to remedy the injustice.

WAR FOR WORLD JUSTICE WIDENS

President Wilson Demands Declaration of War Against Austria

PRESIDENT WILSON in his address at the reassembling of the Sixty-fifth Congress called for an immediate declaration of war on Austria-Hungary.

So far as Turkey and Bulgaria are concerned, he said, they are merely tools of Germany, and a declaration of war against them is not needed at this time.

Almost at the opening of his message he declared:

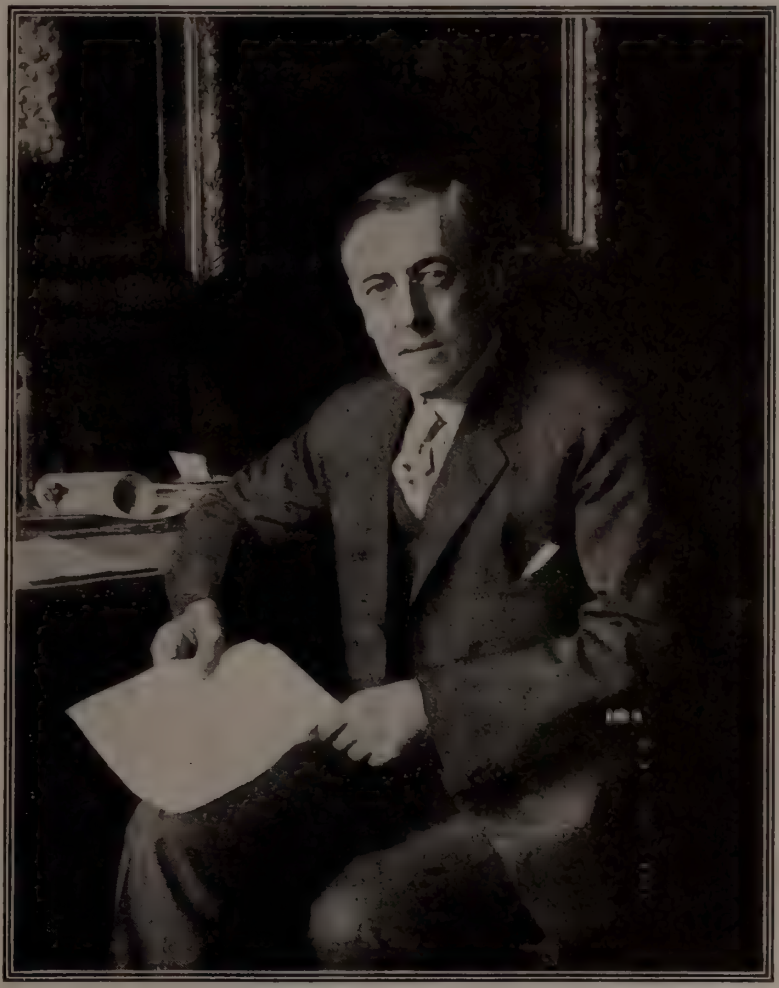
"Our present and immediate task is to win the war, and nothing shall turn us aside from it until it is accomplished.

"Every power and resource we possess, whether of men, of money or of materials, is being devoted and will continue to be devoted to that purpose until it is achieved.

"Those who desire to bring peace about before that purpose is achieved I counsel to carry their advice elsewhere. We will not entertain it. I earnestly recommend that Congress immediately declare the United States in a state of war with Austria-Hungary.

"The government of Austria-Hungary is not acting upon its own initiative or in response to the wishes and feelings of its own peoples, but as the instrument of another nation. We must meet its force with our own and regard the Central Powers as but one. The war can be successfully conducted in no other way.

"The same logic would lead to a declaration of war against Turkey and Bulgaria. They also are the tools of Germany. But they are mere tools, and do not yet stand in the direct path of our necessary action."



President Wilson

THE President stated the terms of peace as follows:

"We shall regard the war as won only when the German people say to us through properly accredited representatives that they are ready to agree to a settlement based upon justice and upon reparation of the wrongs their rulers have done.

"It must deliver the once fair lands and happy peoples of Belgium and northern France from the Prussian conquest and the Prussian menace, but it must also deliver the peoples of Austria-Hungary, the peoples of the Balkans and the peoples of Turkey, alike in Europe and Asia, from the impudent and alien dominion of the Prussian military and commercial autocracy.

"We intend no wrong against the German Empire, no interference with her internal affairs. We should deem either the one or the other absolutely unjustifiable, absolutely contrary to the principles we have professed to live by and to hold most sacred throughout our life as a nation.

"The wrongs, the very deep wrongs, committed in this war will have to be righted. That of course. But they cannot and must not be righted by the commission of similar wrongs against Germany and her allies. The world will not permit the commission of similar wrongs as a means of reparation and settlement.

"Our entrance into the war has not altered our attitude toward the settlement that must come when it is over. When I said in January that the nations of the world were entitled not only to free pathways upon the seas, but also to assured and unmolested access to those pathways, I was thinking, and I am thinking now, not of the smaller and weaker nations alone, which need our countenance and support, but also of the great and powerful nations and of our present enemies as well as our present associates in the war. I was thinking, and am thinking now, of Austria herself, among the rest, as well as of Serbia and of Poland. Justice and equality of rights can be had only at a great price. We are seeking permanent, not temporary, foundations for the peace of the world, and must seek them candidly and fearlessly. As always, the right will prove to be the expedient."

On economic subjects the President recommended: Congress must go further in authorizing the government to set limits to prices to check unrestrained selfishness and profiteering.

A budget system to stop waste and extravagance in appropriations.

More strict restraint of alien enemies, putting many of them in penitentiaries and treating them as criminals instead of housing them in detention camps. Women as well as men to be included under the alien enemy act.

WITH this reassembling of Congress there began what is expected to be the most vitally important session in the history of the nation.

Among the important measures confronting Congress were:

Declaration of war against Austria-Hungary, Turkey and Bulgaria,

National prohibition by amendment to the Constitution,

Equal suffrage by the same process,

Universal military training,

Amendment of the selective service law and compulsory military service for friendly aliens,

Authorization of about $18,000,000,000 for government expenses and loans to the Allies,

Possible trial of Senator La Follette,

Railroad legislation and bills to control exports and to protect civil rights of soldiers and sailors.

ORGANIZATION of both Senate and House having been affected at the special session, both bodies are ready to plunge into the mass of waiting business. Legislation, however, is not expected to get into full swing until next month, after the Christmas recess, although there is some agitation to forego the holiday. The world-wide struggle that means life or death for nations, as well as for individuals, is in control of President Wilson, so far as Congress is concerned. Every member of the House and Senate except a few is perfectly willing that its management be intrusted to the man in the White House.

But to most of the members there are considerations more vital to themselves at least for Congress to deal with. There is an election next November when every member of the House and thirty-four Senators must face their constituents, including newly enfranchised women voters; hence there will be much playing of politics.

Congress to Make Appropriations of About Eighteen Billions

ESTIMATES of over $13,500,000,000 greatest in the nation's history—for the conduct of the government and the prosecution of the war during the fiscal year 1919 were submitted to Congress by the Treasury Department. In round figures more than $11,000,000,000 of the vast sum is for the war alone. Only part of it will be realized from taxation; the remainder will come from issues of Liberty Bonds. Deducting an item of $153,000,000, intended as an annual appropriation toward a sinking fund for the discharge of the old public debt, and some $330,000,000 which will be turned back to the Treasury from postal revenues, the estimated sum which Congress actually is expected to appropriate is $13,018,725,595. No previous estimate ever has exceeded $2,000,000,000. With $21,390,000,000 already appropriated for the present fiscal year's needs, many members believe that with forthcoming appropriations the fifty-billion-dollar mark may be reached for two years of war. New war revenue legislation is not scheduled for active consideration for a month or more. A deficit of $3,906,000,000 in this year's expenditures remains to be provided for.

IMPORTANT war legislation expected to come of the present session includes measures to give the President further authority, especially over enemy aliens; Senator Chamberlain's bill for universal military training, and measures to meet labor conditions.

Chief among domestic concerns are prohibition and woman suffrage. Senator Sheppard's proposed constitutional amendment for prohibition, whose submission was approved August 1 by the Senate, 65 to 20, will be pressed in the House, while both bodies will be urged to approve submission of the so-called Susan B. Anthony amendment for equal suffrage, which has been favorably reported to the Senate calendar.

Important general legislation pending because of its exclusion from the last special war session are the Webb bill permitting exporters to combine in foreign trade—which has twice passed the House and is the Senate's unfinished business; the Shields waterpower development bill, the Walsh-Pittman oil and coal land leasing measure, and the Colombian treaty, proposing payment of $25,000,000 to Colombia.

The administration soldiers' and sailors' civil rights bill, which passed the House last session, but failed to get through the Senate, will be taken up by the Senate judiciary committee. Other unfinished war legislation includes Senator Chamberlain's resolution to subject aliens to the draft; Senator Calder's bills for daylight saving and for expeditious naturalization of aliens, and Senator Pomerene's bill to enforce government control of iron and steel products and for reclamation of physically unfit men for military service.

Revision of second-class postage rates for publications also promises to be agitated during the session.

Creation of a Congressional committee to supervise war expenditures, which President Wilson prevented during the last session, will be urged again.

Spectacular features during the session are regarded as possible developments from the agitation against Senator La Follette and others because of their opposition to some war legislation. He and Senator Hardwick of Georgia have announced their intention to seek repeal of the draft law, while Senators La Follette and Sherman of Illinois have peace resolutions pending before the Senate foreign relations committee.

The harbor and waterfront of Halifax looking across the Narrows toward Dartmouth

© Underwood & Underwood

THE HORROR AT HALIFAX

HALIFAX harbor, which, since the institution of the German war zone about Great Britain, has become the greatest port of British America, was devastated at 9 A.M., December 6, by the explosion of 2,800 tons of munitions including 30 tons of T. N. T. on board the French line steamship Mont Blanc. The explosion was the result of a misunderstanding of signals resulting in a collision with the Belgian relief steamship Imo, the point of the collision being at the Narrows in the channel connecting Halifax harbor with the inner harbor known as Bedford Basin. The older part of Halifax, known as Richmond, fronts on this portion of the harbor, and on the other shore is the town of Dartmouth. The shores rise in fairly steep slopes from the channel, and the houses, most of which were frame, stood in tiers upon this rising slope. The Mont Blanc carried, in addition to the munitions in her hold, a deck-load of benzol, which caught fire after the impact of the collision. The crew attempted to fight the fire, but soon took to the boats, reaching shore in safety. Seventeen minutes later the ship blew up.

The force of the explosion swept up the steep slopes on each side of the half-mile channel, flattening the frame houses to the ground and burying men, women and children in the wreckage. Hot, stoves in the houses set numerous fires, and the devastated region was soon flame-swept. In addition to the frame dwellings piers, docks, the railway station, the arena rink, the military gymnasium, a sugar refinery, an immense cotton factory, an elevator, and St. Joseph's Church and parochial school collapsed, adding many to the number of lost, killed and injured, which on December 8 was estimated at 2,000 persons killed, with more than 3,000 injured.

The lower part of Halifax, where the buildings were of stone and concrete, was shaken as by an earthquake. The permanent damage there was largely reckoned in broken glass. The piers and harbor works which had been erected for the loading of transports and munition ships, and the warehouses, filled with supplies and munitions awaiting shipment, were located some distance southward of the scene of the explosion and escaped destruction, although they were badly damaged. Over two square miles of the Richmond district were laid in ruins.

The shock of the explosion broke windows sixty-one miles from Halifax and killed a telegrapher at his key four miles away. The surrounding towns and cities responded to the first report of the disaster by hurrying rescue parties, physicians and fire apparatus to the stricken city. The American Red Cross dispatched trains bearing doctors, nurses and supplies from both Boston and New York, and a special train was sent from Boston on the order of Governor McCall of Massachusetts. Canadian troops and American bluejackets from a warship, which saw and heard the explosion 52 miles away and rushed to the port, patrolled the city and aided in the search for the dead and injured, in which the whole population joined, while business was suspended.

Following the collision, the Imo caught fire and was beached. Many sailors from the crews of ships in the harbor were blown from the decks.

At first the people of Halifax thought they were being subjected to a fleet or air raid and the streets were filled with panic-stricken throngs trying to reach the outskirts of the city, but in half an hour thousands of people who had sought refuge in the fields, were being organized for the work of rescue and relief. Public buildings and private homes were thrown open to house the homeless, the school buildings became hospitals, the troops erected tents on the Common and surrendered their barracks to the women and children, and an appeal was sent out for supplies of glass, tar paper, beaver board, putty, bedding and blankets.

A driving snowstorm, almost a blizzard, on December 7, added to the horror of the disaster, yet at the same time helped in preventing its extension, as it aided in putting out the fires. All of the rescue forces in the stricken city bent their energies throughout that day to the saving from the wreckage of all the injured possible before the driving snow and sleet and the intense cold should add uncounted hundreds to the already great toll of death. Refugees in windowless houses, where fires were impossible because of shattered flues, boarded up windows and stopped gaping rents in the walls. Relief trains were delayed by the snow and telegraphic communications were frequently broken by the storm. Soldiers who passed through the scenes on December 6 and 7 declared them worse than a battlefield. Dead bodies they were used to, but to these were added frantic parents seeking children, crushed beyond recognition, frightened children searching for parents who were no more, desperate husbands helpless before their ruined and blazing homes, half-clad figures, bleeding and staggering away only to fall and die in the littered streets, confusion and agony, smoke and terror, a horror indescribable.

Just a little error of judgment of one or both of two pilots, and in seventeen minutes a busy port becomes a raging furnace. Halifax, the busy port, was only a prosperous city doing its bit in the struggle of the nations; Halifax destroyed is the sister of every town and city on the continent, the center toward which run streams of love and helpfulness. Out of disaster comes forth mercy, and Halifax in ruins, like China under flood, India in famine, Armenia and Belgium in misery, is one more opportunity for the expression of the heaven-born kindness, the brotherly sympathy, of our humanity.

The following telegram was dispatched on December 8 by the Christian Herald to the Acting Mayor of Halifax:

"The Christian Herald and its readers throughout the Union, extend sincere sympathy to the people of Halifax in their sore affliction. Cabling $5,000 today, at Mayor's disposal for immediate relief. The Christian Herald."

Progress of the War

By
ANTHONY ARNOUX

ONE of the fiercest battles of the war on that part of the western front held by the British took place to the west and southwest of Cambrai, beginning on the morning of Friday, November 30, and continuing violently for the next three days. The British, a week or so before, had made considerable advance in the sectors west and southwest of Cambrai, and the new battle was the result of an attempt by the Germans to win back ground.

The British position was in the form of a sharp east-jutting salient. This the Germans attacked simultaneously on its northern and southern sides following up these lateral attacks by an assault in force on the apex of the salient. On the northern side the British line was only slightly dented, but on the apex it was driven in some distance, while on its southern side the Teutonic advance was marked at one time as extending to some 7,000 yards in depth, though, before a lull came, the British succeeded in recovering about 2,000 yards.

The fighting for three days was very severe. In addition to taking about 9,000 prisoners and capturing 148 guns the Teutons succeeded to a very considerable degree in relieving the pressure by the British on Cambrai, that important buttress of their defensive line from Arras to Laon. Elsewhere on the western front the week was quiet.

On December 6 it was announced by both Berlin and Petrograd that the plenipotentiaries of Russia and Germany, who met at Brest-Litovsk on December 4, had arranged an armistice of twenty-eight days, during which time peace negotiations were to be carried on, with a proviso that if the negotiations were not finished when the armistice expired, another armistice of equal length should come into effect automatically. Before this announcement the general staff of the Russian army, which had previously refused to recognize the authority of the Lenine government, submitted to that government after a riot in which General Dukhonin, the Russian commander-in-chief, was killed. Rumanian authorities announced, on December 7, their participation of an armistice. As to the interior situation in Russia, it looks as though the Lenine government were growing stronger.

The toll of British shipping taken by the U-boats during the past week was slightly below the average as regards vessels over 1,600 tons, sixteen being sunk, and considerably below as regards the smaller vessels under that tonnage, only one being torpedoed. From the end of February to the end of October inclusive, according to Dr. McNamara (in reply to a question in the House of Commons on November 8) a grand total of 1,052 British ships have been sunk by mine or submarine; French losses were 2 vessels over 1,600 tons, 2 below and 2 fishing boats.

On the Palestine front the Turks are becoming progressively aggressive, the British meanwhile standing in a general sense on the defensive. The British, on December 7, announced the taking of Hebron.

Austro-German troops assaulted and captured some of the Italian hill positions in the Sette Communi region on December 5, 6, and 7, capturing 11,000 prisoners. The Italian line was withdrawn and straightened and was reported holding on December 7. This region was the scene of very severe fighting in the Austrian offensive of May and June, 1916.

A WEEK IN THE WORLD'S NEWS

Representative F. H. Gillett

Of Massachusetts. New Republican leader of the House

War On Austria. At 5:03 o'clock P.M. on December 7 the United States went to war against Austria-Hungary. At that hour President Wilson approved a joint resolution which passed the Senate at 1:45, the House at about 4, and was made ready for his signature at 4:45 P. M. The Senate vote for the resolution was unanimous, Senator LaFollette being absent. The vote in the House was 363 for to 1 against the resolution, the one being Representative Meyer London, who declared that, as a Socialist, he could not vote for war. The debate upon the resolution was somewhat perfunctory, since there was little difference of opinion and such as there was was largely concerned with the question of including Bulgaria and Turkey in the declaration. Senator Stone, chairman of the Foreign Relations Committee of the Senate, presented the resolution in that body. Representative Flood, chairman of the similar Committee in the House, outlined the government's case against Austria in presenting the resolution, saying that Austria had concurred in the German submarine campaign on January 31 after having given assurances that she would abide by the law of nations regarding war at sea; and that Austria was wholly dominated by Germany, so that its purposes and aims were the same as those of that "powerful autocracy which is seeking to strangle liberty throughout the world that it may gratify its vast ambitions." In closing, Mr. Flood said: "Let us link together for overwhelming defeat the two medieval governments which have plunged the world into the war and still stand as the worst obstacles toward a just peace among the nations." The House accepted the Senate resolution in place of one offered by its own committee, the text being as follows:

"Whereas, the Imperial and Royal Austro-Hungarian Government has committed repeated acts of war against the Government and the people of the United States of America; therefore be it

"Resolved, by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America, in Congress assembled, that a state of war is hereby declared to exist between the United States of America and the Imperial and Royal Austro-Hungarian Government; and the President be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to employ the entire naval and military forces of the United States and resources of the Government to carry on war against the Imperial and Royal Austro-Hungarian Government; and to bring the conflict to a successful termination all the resources of the country are hereby pledged by the Congress of the United States."

England Stirred Over Lansdowne Letter. Lord Lansdowne's plea for a restatement of the aims of the Allies "before the prolongation of the war leads to the ruin of the civilized world" has thrown England into a tumult of agitation. All the leading English papers have leading articles on his letter, and the Manchester Guardian says it understands that a meeting of the opposition Liberal leaders, at which former Premier Asquith was present, was entirely favorable to the recent Lansdowne letter, although some of the leaders went further than others in their approval.

Boycotting German Business. On December 4 a blacklist of over 1,500 German-controlled banks, insurance companies, public utilities and manufactories in Spanish America, Brazil, and Haiti was published by the government as part of its war activities. The banks and public utilities of Argentina are the most important and the hardest hit. This action was made necessary by the fact that German-owned companies in neutral nations have financed much of the intrigue and propaganda conducted in the interest of the Imperial Government. Trade with them therefore lends aid and comfort to the enemy.

To Unify Railroads. The Interstate Commerce Commission made a report to Congress on December 5 which declared that the country faced the alternative of unifying the railway systems of the nation into one aggregate force under their own operation, or the operation of the roads as a unit by the President. The report of the Commission declared that the rate increase alone would not solve the problems of the railways and enable them to meet the national situation adequately. The Commission also recommended government financial aid to the railways and the repeal, during the war, of laws forbidding combinations and pooling in order that full use may be made in the national interests of every piece of railway equipment, regardless of ownership.

The Star and the Child

Following the Star to the Child. Charles Grant Miller, in a decorative center spread, next week shows the Child leading us to the stars—a feature for the Christmastide.

To members of the Christian Herald family Dr. Francis E. Clark is an old, beloved and familiar friend. His sermon closes the year with a retrospect in which his prophet's eye foresees the triumph of the Christ.

Next week we meet "The Alien" in a Christmas story.

And next week, too, the second series of Professor James M. Gray's articles on prophecy is continued with a clear and scholarly presentation of "The End of the Age and How to Meet It."

More Troopships. It was announced on December 5 that one result of the Paris Inter-Allied Conference was the coordination of sea transport facilities, which, coupled with a restriction of exports of necessities, would release additional tonnage for the transportation of American troops to France. The French Foreign Office announced that at this Inter-Allied Conference, agreements were concluded "upon the basis of a complete understanding and close solidarity among the Allies for the solution of the questions in which they have a common interest in the war."

Electoral Reform in Germany. Imperial Chancellor von Hertling introduced in the Prussian Diet on December 7 a bill to reform the electoral laws of Prussia. He declared that he was fulfilling the royal pledge, and that the present electoral system was obsolete, it being the necessary task of true statesmanship to take innovations in hand courageously when the people's need for development required it. The details of the new bill were not available at this writing.

General Dukhonin

Who succeeded Kerensky in command, defied the Bolsheviki and was lynched

Killed in Action. General Pershing on December 5 reported the names of two men killed in action, seven men severely and four slightly wounded. The casualties occurred between November 12 and 17. The men killed were: Virgil G. Winebrenner of Marion, Ind., and Peter Wojtalewicz of Chicago, Ill.

Fragments of News. Chinese rebels were reported on December 5 to have taken the city of Chungking. Japanese marines were landed to protect foreigners. . . . A military commission of eight members representing the Brazilian nation, headed by Colonel Alipio Gama, reached New York December 5. It was announced that the commission would remain at least a year to purchase all kinds of war material for its government. . . . The final thirty per cent. of the first National Army began to reach the mobilization camps on December 5, the rookies being appropriately welcomed by the veterans of the first increment. . . . The Dodge-Ford suit, which has been contested for some time in Detroit, was ended on December 5 by a decision of the court requiring the Ford Motor Company to defer a dividend of $9,275,385, and requiring it in the future to distribute all profits such as may not be reasonably required in the conduct of the business. The court found that the Ford charter did not permit of its conducting a smelting business, and ordered the money invested in the River Rouge project to be returned to the stockholders, this being a large part of the money required to make up the dividend. . . . It was announced on December 5 that the United States had formally recognized the neutrality of Switzerland, and that immediate steps would be taken to relieve the pressing economic situation both in foodstuffs and in materials for Swiss manufactures. It was suggested that some of the Dutch vessels to be released by the recent agreement with the Netherlands might be used to transport supplies to Switzerland. . . . The sugar famine in New York was in a fair way to relief on December 6 through the arrival of 3,000,000 pounds of raw Cuban sugar. . . . The Shipping Board on December 5 made contracts for the construction of twelve more 8,000-ton steel cargo ships. It was announced on the same day that two more vessels under construction had been completed, one of 10,000 tons at an Atlantic Coast yard and one of 3,500 tons on the Great Lakes. . . . The consolidation of the Congregationalist and the Advance is announced, and the merged publications will hereafter appear with the title of the Congregationalist and Advance. . . . Andrew Bonar Law announced in the House of Commons, on December 10, that British troops had surrounded and taken Jerusalem, which, except for two brief terms in Christian hands, had been Moslem for 1,200 years. The campaign has been proceeding since December of 1916. . . . News dispatches of December 8 from Madrid, London and Washington told of disorders in Portugal, where revolutionary outbreaks were said to have occurred in Oporto, Tuy and Lisbon. . . . Ecuador on December 8 announced that it had broken diplomatic relations with Germany. . . . The Salvation Army is conducting a campaign for $1,000,000 to finance work in military camps abroad. This work will be in addition to the work of the Y. M. C. A., and both have official sanction. . . . The national convention of the W. C. T. U. closed in Washington, December 8. Steps were taken to see that our soldiers in France were supplied with pure drinking water, and the convention closed after adopting the slogan, "Win the war first, then prohibition."

American Ship Sunk. The United States destroyer Jacob Jones, commanded by Lieutenant Commander David Worth Bagley, was torpedoed at 4:12 P.M., December 6, outside the declared submarine danger zone, sinking in seventeen minutes. The submarine was not seen until some time later, when it appeared, rescuing and taking prisoner one of the members of the crew. Of the total complement of 110, forty-four, including the commander, were known on December 10 to have been rescued. The Jacob Jones was one of the newest and fastest destroyers. She was placed in commission February 10, 1916, was 315 feet long, displaced 1,150 tons, and had a speed of 29½ knots. Last February two attempts were made to sink the Jones by opening her sea-cocks.

The Glad Day

THE story of the first Christmas is perhaps the most beautiful story told among men.

If it had no religious significance, if it were not the beginning of a new era in human history, if it were merely an idyl conceived by a poet or contrived by the accruing imagination of the race, it still would be unsurpassed in its touch upon all the poetic, imaginative and romantic instincts.

Fancy has never invented scenes so lovely and appealing as those of the holy night at Bethlehem.

The shepherds keeping watch over the flocks by night; the angel breaking from the sky to herald the tidings of great joy, and the sudden flocking down of a multitude of the heavenly host, hymning the "Gloria in Excelsis"; the manger and the Babe—in these things, with the star and the visit of the kings with their gifts of gold, frankincense and myrrh, the genius of the greatest poets and painters for nineteen centuries has found inexhaustible founts of inspiration; in them it has recognized perhaps its principal power to delight.

On this day, the people of almost the entire civilized world put aside their tools, their accounts, their schemings and their cares and come with their golden joys, their frankincense and myrrh, their good will and charity, to this lowly birth-bed at Bethlehem.

The humble manger was the magnificent stage of the most dramatic incident of the ages. It has stirred to their utmost deeps the hearts of men and to their minds has displayed the seven-hued arch of hope.

And so this day is the sweetest day of all the year.

Sanctified by religious meaning, it is furthermore surrounded by quaint tradition and rendered delightful by the prevalence of good cheer. For the feast has become inseparable from the spirit of the song of the Nativity, which is not only Glory to God in the highest, but Peace on earth, good will to men.

Being a feast in honor of a Child, and recognized as especially a children's holiday, it still sways older spirits with much the same jubilance and enthusiasm as that with which they looked forward to Christmas and kept it in their youth.

It is a heart-enlarging time—a time in which our hearts as well as our ears may hear "the clear church bells ring in the Christmas morn," and know that they call to us to prove our faith by our works, and to show that Christianity means not only right thinking, but right living and right feeling.

The dear old associations that cluster about Christmas! How we smile at them; and yet how barren of meaning would the day, and life, be without them!

Planning Without God

AMONG the many letters that come to us in these eventful days, a large proportion sum up the writers' observations with the remark that the world-war, which is still going on with unabated force, has "shaken the very foundations of our modern civilization." This is doubtless the natural conclusion of thoughtful minds, and it suggests the question whether those foundations were sound, or whether, instead of resting upon the solid rock of God's sovereign providence, they were not rather laid upon soil that proved treacherous and insecure.

All past experience demonstrates convincingly that the nation which plans without God plans amiss. In his illuminating series of articles on prophecy, Dr. Gray has dealt with this significant phase of the question of national duration. History affords many examples of nations which, after attaining a high degree of civilization and making themselves masters of vast possessions, with dominion over many peoples, have at last been swept away so completely that scarcely a trace of them now remains. Nebuchadnezzar's mighty realm and his boast of "this great Babylon, which I have built," are well-nigh forgotten, and the influence of their laws, their culture and their civilization has disappeared. And so with a long line of what once were the earth's great empires, extending from Nebuchadnezzar to Napoleon. In their day they set the world on fire; now they are little more than a memory. Their kingdoms and their civilizations were reared upon insecure foundations; they served "the prince of this world," instead of recognizing the sovereignty and seeking the guidance of the Ruler of the universe.

May not this be one of the great lessons of our own times: that the modern civilization of which the nations have been so proud has proved to be founded too largely upon vanity and selfish indulgence; that God has been left out of the reckoning, and that, in some remarkable way, their very accomplishments have become transformed into agencies for destruction?

As it was with the ancient, so is it with the modern world. Divine wisdom has set a limit to human power and ambition. It is God who directs the final issues, who removes the mitre, who takes off the crowns, abases the high, exalts the low and sweeps away every power that would grasp at supreme authority, until He shall come whose right it is to reign and whose rule shall be everlasting. The story is told that many years ago in the Arabian desert a pillar was dug up by a party of explorers. Upon it was found a worn and almost illegible inscription, which on being deciphered, read: "I am Ozymandias, king of kings; look on my works, ye mighty, and despair!" Other than this fragment, the world has no knowledge that such a ruler ever existed. None know of his empire, which may lie buried deep amid the sands of the desert.

Omnipotence draws the line beyond which human ambition may not go. He in whose hand is the supreme government of all, will have no rival in authority. Wars may rage and nations rise and fall, but Omnipotence, silent, invisible, is overruling all the failures and the errors of men and carrying forward the divine plan to final completion. This conviction that should give new hope and courage to those who are sorely tried in the stress and anxieties of the times. God's ultimate purpose for the race of men cannot be defeated. It may be that at the close of this war we are to have such a demonstration of the overruling of human ambitions as the world needs as a corrective, and which will bring it back to universal recognition of the divine rulership, and place civilization on the solid foundations of dependence upon God and obedience to his will, making it, more than it has ever been in the past, a blessing to the world.

> "God's in his heaven—

The Day of Small Savings

LET us confess it that as a nation we are not given to thrift. We reckon too lightly the value of small things. Many of us waste on trifles the little sums which in the aggregate would be the nucleus of a provision for old age.

In the issue of Thrift Stamps, our government makes direct appeal to the small investor, and especially to the rising generation. It shows how the odd pennies may be made profitable. For 25 cents any adult, or any boy or girl, can buy a Thrift Stamp at a post office, bank, school or department store. He can get at the place of purchase one of the government Thrift Cards, which contains all the necessary information and instructions. The buyer is to save up his 25 cent Thrift Stamps, as he acquires them, up to the number of sixteen. Then he can take them to the post office, the bank, or to any authorized agent, paying the number of cents indicated in the little table at the bottom of the card—the total running from 12 to 23 cents. Handing this card, on which the stamps are affixed, to the agent, he receives a regular War Savings Certificate Stamp, for which he has paid anywhere from $4.12 up to $4.23. This War Savings Certificate Stamp is redeemable by the government on January 1, 1923, at $5, which represents the outlay for Thrift Stamps plus 4 per cent. interest compounded quarterly. Anyone holding a number of these War Savings Certificate Stamps, on the basis outlined, has an absolutely safe and good investment, drawing the highest rate of savings bank interest.

Every owner of a War Savings Certificate Stamp, no matter where it may be purchased, can register it at a post office. The owner of it has now entered on the career of a capitalist, with the United States government as his guaranteed debtor. This plan affords the finest opportunity for thrift. It should give not only the grown-ups, but more especially the youth of our nation, a new angle on the possibilities of the pennies. It will instil the saving habit—which is a good one for everybody to acquire—and at the same time it will carry with it the knowledge that a patriotic duty has been performed. New York has begun with its first allotment of several millions of these stamps, which have been placed on sale in schools, stores, banks and restaurants. This method is duplicated in every city throughout the country. There is little doubt that in a very short time all the allotments will be taken up, and a boy or girl who has not done his or her "bit" in becoming the owner of some of these stamps, will be hard to find. Save your pennies and buy thrift stamps and you will be doing as much toward helping the government in proportion to your means and opportunities as the most ardent patriot could desire.

The Growth of Millionaires

IF increase of wealth be the best index of real prosperity, then the United States is an amazingly prosperous nation. It has become the custom in late years to inveigh against the increase in the number of colossal fortunes, but their growth in the "piping times of peace" was a slow process in comparison with the results produced by the world-war. A pretty accurate line on the increase of American wealth has been furnished since the introduction of the War Income Tax. No less than 7,925 were added to the millionaire list of this nation within the last year, and it is reasonably certain that the present year will also show a considerable increase. In 1915, the first year of the war, the income tax totaled some $67,000,000, and last year it reached $180,000,000. There are now in the millionaire class 22,696 individuals.

Without the slightest desire to be unjust to those who have acquired their wealth honorably and legitimately, it is unquestionable that the latest increase of large fortunes in the United States represents profiteering to a considerable extent. In such cases, the growth is to be regretted, since it means that the life-blood of the many has been drawn to enrich the few. Happily, the government is now on the track of the profiteers so vigorously that we feel justified in hoping that there will be fewer opportunities for accumulation at the people's expense during the rest of the war. And incidentally it is worth while remarking that there is a promising prospect of shifting a larger share of the burden imposed by war conditions upon those who are best able to bear it.

Better Than Our Fathers ?

A MAGAZINE writer refuses to believe that "the good old times" were good at all, and proceeds to show that dishonesty and swindling were more common and barefaced in "the good old days" than at present.

Plenty of historic scandals are handed down to us to show that our fathers and grandfathers were not altogether immaculate.

But what does it matter that there was more dishonesty in the old days—or less—than there is now?

The fact for us to face is that there is more now than there ought to be.

We are not responsible for our fathers' sins, but we are responsible for our own.

We have nothing to do with history that is made; we have everything to do with history that is making.

Whether the times have grown better or worse, there is reason enough to fight dishonesty still, and room to improve upon present conditions.

It is for us to measure our strength to resist corruption, not by that of our fathers, but by the best we have done ourselves.

We are unworthy of a place in the world of progress if we cannot do better than our grandfathers could.

We are unworthy if we cannot do better today than we ourselves did yesterday, and better tomorrow than today.

Evil thoughts are like weeds—they are conceived in the dark but they soon creep up to the surface.

Feeling makes good spiritual kindling, but the good back log of loyalty is needed to keep up the fire.

Love is the greatest thing in the world, but hate is the smallest, meanest microbe that ever defiled a man's soul.

A Jewish Republic

THE plan of the Zionists for the Jews to go back to Jerusalem and take possession of Palestine as the permanent home of their race, which has seemed an unreal vision, now seems to be a practical proposition likely to be carried out before very long. The English government endorses the plan of making Palestine a Jewish commonwealth, under a British protectorate. The Manchester Guardian, in advocating the proposition, says: "The Jewish land is Palestine: the Jewish language is Hebrew. Palestine is the Jewish land because whatever national life the Jewish people have lived has been inseparably associated with that country. When they constituted a state, its seat was Palestine. Their literature has sprung from that soil. Their law, their institutions, their cult, have been molded in the image of Palestine. Two thousand years of exile have produced no divorce, for tradition and hope, the impress of the past and the promise of the future, have kept Palestine before the eye of every true Jew as the goal of the age-long Jewish pilgrimage through the wilderness." The new Jewish state will not be created until after the war. The American Jews may take a sentimental interest in the contemplated Jewish Republic of Palestine, but few are likely to go back to help found it. America is good enough for them; they have found it truly a land flowing with milk and honey. If any one doubts this, let him ride on the surface cars from the Battery in New York up Broadway to Thirty-fourth Street, and read the names on the signs above the doors, or ride on the top of the bus up Fifth Avenue or Riverside Drive and ask the guide to point out the palatial residences owned by Hebrews. The Jews of New York and other cities in America are not hanging their harps on the willows and crying to get to Jerusalem; but all their exile they count a journey of mental, financial and domestic conquest. The constancy of the Jew's love for Palestine while an exile from it is thus sung by Israel's ideal poet, who sang his people's aspirations during the Babylonian captivity, out of which they were led by Ezra: "If I forget thee, O Jerusalem, let my right hand forget her cunning. If I do not remember thee, let my tongue cleave to the roof of my mouth; if I prefer not Jerusalem above my chief joy." (Ps. 137 : 5-6.)

Greatest Volcano on Earth

UP to 1912 Krakatoa, a small island between Sumatra and Java, which exploded on August 27, 1883, held the record of being one of the greatest volcanoes of history. The island was literally blown into the air so high that its dust was scattered around the world, taking fifteen days for the journey. On June 6, 1912, Katmai volcano, one of the Aleutian range in Alaska, became suddenly active. The eruption threw up a mass of ash and pumice five cubic miles in volume, depositing ash 900 miles away and sending a cloud of dust 40,000 feet high into the upper atmosphere, all around the world, darkening the sky throughout the United States. The record was taken away from Krakatoa. The whole island of Krakatoa could be dropped down into the crater of Katmai. The scientific expedition sent out by the National Geographical Society headed by Professor Robert F. Griggs of the Ohio State University has returned to Washington and has made an official report of what is believed to be the greatest volcano in the history of the world. They found that the whole of Alaska from southwest to northeast is split by a fissure through which steam and fire are escaping. This fissure is 1,000 miles long, running from the Aleutian Islands, which are a chain of volcanoes, into the heart of Alaska. In describing the crater Professor Griggs writes that "its circumference is nine miles and its depth 3,000 feet. About half of the bottom is occupied by a wonderful blue and green vitriolic lake with the crescent-shaped remains of an ash cone in the middle. In the larger end was a circle of lighter colored water, which was in constant ebullition." The water of the ocean in contact with the internal fires of the earth generates the gases that cause the explosions. The gradual cooling and settling of the earth's surface give the elements a better opportunity to produce the fearful convulsion. The scientific expedition believes that the heavy press of the ice fields had much to do in causing the colossal convulsion of Katmai. Severity as well as mildness is revealed in nature, in human experience and in the Scriptures. There is the terrible tornado as well as the gentle zephyr, the horrible volcano and earthquake as well as the lovely landscape, Mount Sinai with its fire and thundering as well as the Mount of Beatitudes. "He putteth forth his hand upon the rock; he overturneth the mountains by the roots." (Job 28 : 9.)

Fence Posts Become Trees

CERTAIN parts of the city of Redlands, California, suffered from floods, and a ditch was dug to carry away the heavy volume of water at the rainy season. The city engineer arranged a barbed wire fence on the banks of the ditch, against which brush was piled to fortify the embankment. At first railroad ties were used as fence posts. It was found that cottonwood posts could be procured for ten cents each less money, and so they used them. The second season the fence posts sprouted, and now they are big trees which serve the double purpose of keeping the floods in check and beautifying the landscape. The development of life in an apparently dead tree is thus referred to: "For there is hope of a tree, if it be cut down, that it will sprout again, and that the tender branch thereof will not cease." (Job 14 : 7.)

Chimney 1,000 Feet High

THAT which is believed to be the tallest chimney in the world is the one just completed at Sagonoseki, Japan. It is of reinforced concrete and stands 570 feet high, on a hill 430 feet higher than the copper smelter with which it is connected. The chimney is 42 feet in diameter at the base, and its inside diameter at the top is 26½ feet. The foundation is 95 feet in diameter, and contains 2,700 cubic yards of concrete. Four hundred tons of steel were used in the whole structure. Its inner construction and height are to neutralize as far as possible the poisonous gases, and discharge them far above the heads of the people. In Bible times they had no such tall smokestacks. Their tallest buildings were then towers from which to watch the enemy and into which they could fly for refuge. "My high tower, and my refuge, my Saviour; thou savest me from violence." (II Sam. 22 : 3.)

Restores Find of Gold

HJOLNAR HELBERG of West 164th Street, New York, found, twenty-five years ago in Central Park West, a red pocketbook containing $400 in gold. He put the money in the bank and afterward used it. Later he prospered, and as his conscience troubled him about the matter he determined to return it to the owner if she could be found, otherwise to donate it to charity. Accordingly the other day he presented to Lieutenant McCann of the 177th Street Police Station an envelope containing $1,026, which, he said, represented the find with interest at six per cent. Helberg said a card bearing a woman's name and the address of a hotel around Fifty-ninth Street was in the pocketbook when he found it, but he does not remember the name or address. He hopes the woman is still living and will be found. In case she cannot be identified, though, he would now have the legal right to retain it. He has stipulated that it is to go to the police pension fund. There is a voice of God within us that tells us when we do wrong, and impels us toward the right, demanding that, as far as possible, the wrongs of the past be righted. There are sins for which no reparation can be made, but there are many others in which reparation can and should be made by every true man and woman. Restitution like that of the yellow gold in the red purse should be made with compound interest. The grafter showed the genuineness of his repentance when he told Christ of his willingness to make restitution with six per cent. compound interest not only, but several hundred per cent. of interest added, in these words: "If I have taken anything from any man by false accusation, I restore him fourfold." (Luke 19 : 8.)

The House on Wheels

MR. AND MRS. A. W. ROBINS of San Francisco, Calif., planned an automobile trip from the Pacific to the Atlantic Ocean on a visit to relatives. Mrs. Robins declared she would not make the trip unless she could have the conveniences of home on the journey. Her husband took a touring automobile and fitted it up like a modern apartment, with bedroom, parlor, library, kitchen and conservatory with growing plants. Big cushioned seats used by the driver in the daytime are transformed at night into a comfortable bed. There is a water tank with running water, hot and cold, also a folding sink, portable baths, and a gas stove. There is electricity and gas for lighting, and there is a separate oven in which Mrs. Robins bakes her own bread. Closets, drawers, butler's pantry, an ice chest, folding chairs and tables, and a writing desk are some of the things put in the house on wheels. When the house was finished Mrs. Robins told her husband that she would like to drive it, which she did all the way across the continent. They stopped in Chicago to see her relatives, and in New York to see his brother, and then went on to Boston with the intention, when the weather became too cold, of going to Florida to remain till spring. They reported some strange experiences, as when the wildcats attacked them; when the brake failed to work and they came near being dashed to death by backing down the mountain; and when as the victrola was playing beautiful tunes the wolves on the mountain sent back their contemptuous howls at the innovation. Mr. Robins is a practical printer and brought his kit of type along to keep from getting out of practice. We are all making a journey across a continent from sea to sea, and are making it in a home on wheels. There is nothing here that is settled or stationary. Everything is in motion. We are automobiling our way from place to place, from city to city. If our hearts be right we are on our way to a home which abides; one of rest and life and joy forever. The thought is thus expressed: "For here we have no continuing city, but we seek one to come." (Heb. 13 : 14.)

The BELLS of BETHLEHEM

A Sermon for The Christmastide

by Rev. David James Burrell, D.D.LL.D.*

TEXT—Isa. 9 : 6. "For unto us a child is born, unto us a Son is given; and the government shall be upon his shoulder: and his name shall be called Wonderful, Counselor, The mighty God, the everlasting Father, the Prince of Peace."

THE WORD of the Lord is yea and amen. When he told Adam, who had been beguiled by the serpent, that "the Seed of Woman" was to come in the fulness of time to bruise the serpent's head, he meant it. But the years dragged their slow length along until centuries had passed, and still he came not.

THE BELLS

The shadows deepened into an Egyptian night. Then Isaiah rang the chimes of prophecy with a gladsome sound, and hope revived.

Hear the mellow, golden bells;
Through the gloomy air of night
How they ring out their delight:
What a world of happiness their harmony foretells!

But Isaiah the bell-ringer could only foretell. The weary world must still be waiting while seven centuries drag their slow length along. Then the hands on God's dial point to the hour, and the clock strikes.

THE SAVIOUR IS BORN

In Bethlehem of Judea a woman is crooning a lullaby to her child lying in a manger. God has not forgotten to be gracious. This is the long-looked-for Messiah "whom kings and prophets longed to see and died without the sight." The song of the angels, "Glory to God in the highest, peace on earth and good will to men," is but an articulation of the far-away bells of prophecy.

THE NAMING OF THE CHILD

The Angel of the Annunciation had said to Mary, "Thou shalt call his name Jesus: for he shall save his people from their sins": and this was what they christened him.

There is no name so sweet on earth,
No name so sweet in heaven;
The name before his wondrous birth,
To Christ the Saviour given.

And here again we observe the fulfilment of prophecy: for what is "Jesus" but all his ancestral names rolled into one? Listen to the five reverberating strokes of Isaiah's bells:

FIRST NOTE

"He shall be called Wonderful." Wonderful in birth; as it is written, "Great is the mystery of godliness; God is manifest in flesh: the angels desire to look into it." Who shall explain the interweaving of deity and humanity, as warp and woof, in the fabric of this Child wrapped in swaddling-bands and lying in a manger? Yet upon those swaddling-bands is written Immanuel, God with us.

Wonderful is his life—a life briefly comprehended in this monograph, "He went about doing good"—a life so blameless that he who lived it could challenge the world to lay anything to his charge—a life so immortal that its influence along the centuries shines brighter and brighter into the perfect day.

Wonderful is his death; for never man died like this Man. He tasted death not for himself but for every man. He was innocent of sin, yet he bore the burden of the world's sin until his great heart broke under it.

Wonderful is his resurrection; for by the power of an indwelling life he triumphed over the king of terrors, and, ascending up on high, took captivity captive that he might forevermore give gifts unto men.

Wonderful—most wonderful—in his life after death; for now he sitteth upon his throne high and lifted up, directing the course of current events. "Is it not amazing," said Napoleon, "that whereas the ambitious dreams of Cæsar and Alexander and myself should have vanished into thin air, a Judæan peasant should be able to stretch a dead hand across the centuries and control the destinies of nations and the children of men?"

THE SECOND NOTE

"His name shall be called Counselor." That is to say, he shall answer the world's need of counsel. And what do men want but to know the way—the way of truth and righteousness—the way back to God? If ever thou standest at the crossroads, unable to discern betwixt the worse and better reason, behold, thou shalt hear a Voice behind thee saying, "This is the way, walk ye in it." And if thou knowest not the Voice, remember the words of the Lord Jesus, how he said, "I am the way, and the truth and the life; no man cometh unto the Father but by me."

THIRD NOTE

"His name shall be called the Mighty God." When Moses desired to see God's glory he hid himself in a cleft of the rock and saw nothing, heard nothing but the rustle of a garment as the Lord passed by. Come now to Bethlehem and behold the hiding of his strength! Is proof demanded of the Godhead of Jesus? Leave that to the theologians. For us the breaking of the day requires no proof. It is enough that the joy of the morning quivers in the air, that the time of the singing of the birds is come, that the eastern sky is radiant with advancing light, that the world grows brighter under the influence of the Sun of Righteousness with every passing day.

FOURTH NOTE

"His name shall be called the Everlasting Father." How then shall he be the only begotten Son? In the mystery of the ineffable Trinity there are not three Gods, but three persons in one: and Jesus is "the fulness of the Godhead bodily." As Ulysses, returning from wars, unbuckled his armor that his children might know him, so the Father unveils himself in the person of his incarnate Son. "Show us the Father," said Philip, "and it sufficeth us." And Jesus said, "Have I been so long time with you, and yet hast thou not known me, Philip? He that hath seen me hath seen the Father. How sayest thou then, Show us the Father? Believest thou not that I am in the Father and the Father in me?"

FIFTH NOTE

"And his name shall be called the Prince of Peace." His Gospel is the Gospel of Reconciliation; of reconciliation between God and man by the blotting out of sin, and of man with his fellow men by the Golden Rule which is destined to bring in the Golden Age. How, then, after the lapse of nineteen centuries, should the nations be now arrayed against each other? The day does not dawn with a sunburst. In due time he that shall come will come and will make no tarrying. But the way to ultimate peace is over many a bloody field. "I am come," said Jesus, "not to bring peace but a sword"—a sword that shall ever leap from its scabbard when the beacons of justice and humanity are kindled on the hills. Meanwhile progress is a fact, and history is not a closed book. The royal standards onward go. We can afford to wait:

For, lo, the days are hastening on,
By prophet bards foretold,
When with the ever-circling years
Comes round the age of gold;
When Peace shall over all the earth
Its ancient splendors fling,
And the whole world give back the song
Which now the angels sing

THE ANOINTING OF THE KING

The message of the prophetic bells is followed by a Voice proclaiming the investiture of the Messiah with a threefold authority.

First: "The government shall be upon his shoulder." The picture is of an Oriental sovereign bearing the key as the symbol of his rightful reign. The authority of Jesus is thus accredited by a voice from heaven, saying, "This is my beloved Son; hear ye him!"

Second: "Of the increase of his government there shall be no end." There has never been a year nor a day since the advent of Christ that has not witnessed such an increase of his authority. All Christendom was at that time embraced in a little patch of sunlight on the eastern shore of the Mediterranean, which has widened, in the logic of events, until it covers the whole of the civilized world. The feeble band of five hundred that gathered on the Mount of Ascension has multiplied into some hundreds of millions; and others are continually falling in. God never fails, and his armies never retreat. The glory of the Gospel is destined to cover the earth as the waters cover the sea.

Third: "His Kingdom shall be established from henceforth even forever." History is a long record of transitory power. Thrones and dynasties have risen, flourished, and tottered to their fall. The thing that hath been shall be.

Scepter and crown must tumble down,
And in the dust be equal made
With the poor plow and spade.

But of the government of Christ, which is being "established with judgment and justice," there shall be no end.

THE SUPREME GUARANTY

The ultimate and perpetual reign of Christ is secured by an inviolate troth, in these words: "The zeal of Jehovah of hosts will perform it." Here is but a variant of the old-time covenant, "When he shall give his soul an offering for sin, he shall see his seed, he shall prolong his days, and the pleasure of the Lord shall prosper in his hand." Our Lord "sees of the fruit of the travail of his soul and is satisfied." The twelve gates of heaven are daily thronged with processions that enter in his name to join with the "ten thousand times ten thousand and thousands of thousands" of saints triumphant who sing the new song, "Worthy art thou to receive honor and glory and power and dominion; for thou hast redeemed us by the blood and made us to be kings and priests unto God forever and ever!"

WAITING STILL

It was a far cry from the protevangel in Paradise to the ringing of Isaiah's bells; and another from Isaiah to the song of the angels on the Judæan hills; and still we await the coming of the Prince of Peace. But the hands on God's dial never turn back. The skies are lurid with the red portents of war. "The kings of the earth set themselves and rulers take counsel together, saying, Let us break his bands asunder and cast away his cords from us! He that sitteth in the heavens shall laugh!" By that burst of divine laughter let us quicken our faith. Who or what are the Great Powers, that they should defy him? With the breath of his nostrils he shall sweep them away. The decree has gone forth, "Thou art my Son; this day have I begotten thee!"

AGAIN AT THE MANGER

This child in swaddling-bands is that "weakness of God which is stronger than men." The little hand that lies so helpless on its mother's breast will shake the pillars of Cæsar's throne; for all power is given unto him in heaven and on earth. His birth is an invasion. The querulous king who wrote the superscription on his cross wrote better than he knew: Jesus Nazaret Rex Judaeorum:

Behold the King of the whole Israel of God! Lift up your eyes round about and see. Who are these that fly as doves to their windows? The ships of Tarshish, the dromedaries of Midian, the flocks of Kedar; they all minister unto him. The kings of the earth shall bring their glory and honor unto him.

But "when he cometh will he find faith on the earth?" No; men's hearts will still be failing them for fear. Nevertheless the government is upon his shoulder; and of its increase there shall be no end until his throne is established from henceforth even for ever. Meanwhile the star of Bethlehem is the star of destiny; and all the Wise Men will follow it.

Fall in therefore and lend a hand. The chimes ring clearer every day. The Christmas fires are burning in a million homes. The heart of the world—a happy world despite its burden of sin—gives back the minstrel's song.

The path of progress must needs be over an undulating country; but it leads right on to the Golden Age. Wherefore let the sons of Asaph raise the tune, "Joy to the world, the Lord is come!" Laugh on, O children, at your happy firesides; dance round the Tree of Gifts, and lead your elders in the service of praise. Noel! Noel! Let hope revive beneath the lurid skies and faith discern the coming of the Truce of God.

Ring out, wild bells, to the wild sky!
Ring out the old, ring in the new!
Ring out the false, ring in the true!

Ring out old shapes of foul disease,
Ring out the narrowing lust of gold,
Ring out the thousand wars of old,
Ring in the thousand years of peace!

Ring in the valiant man and free,
The larger heart, the kindlier hand!
Ring out the darkness of the land;
Ring in the Christ that is to be!

Sunday Schools Unite in Service

THE Sunday Schools of the world, through the Interdenominational Sunday School War Council, have united for a Christmas offering to save the starving in Bible lands. All schools that have not already done so should write to the American Committee for Armenian and Syrian Relief, 1 Madison Avenue, New York, for literature, posters, programs, Christmas cards, envelops and supplies, indicating clearly the size of the school and the denomination.

The Mystic Control of the Journey

SUNDAY, December 23. Gal. 2 : 2. "I went up by revelation." Here the ministry of revelation is throwing its light upon an ordinary journey, a journey to Jerusalem. Revelation is using its rays not to illumine some great doctrine, or to disclose a panorama of hidden truth, but to light up a road. This man, Paul, has claimed that the great Revealer has opened out deep mysteries to his understanding, and has given him insight into the mind of Christ; but he now makes an even more wonderful boast in the Lord; he claims that the mystic glory will relate itself to a journey, and will determine and direct a visit to Jerusalem. "I went up by revelation."

Now we are indeed poor if we assume that we have the revealing guidance only in the larger explorations of the mind, those vast ventures through untraversed continents of sacred truth, and that we are left to the darkness of our own gropings in the rough-and-tumble of every-day life. We are indeed bereft if some truth is illumined, but the immediate road we have to travel is held in the deep darkness of tropical woods. Can it be that the guiding Hand fails us when we need light upon the journey?

Happily the word of promise is clear and sure. There are stars for vaster moments: there are lamps for common roads. The glory of the Lord is not alone for those who travel on great mental pilgrimages in quest of lands that are very far off; it is for that vaster multitude of pilgrims who travel between Antioch and Jerusalem, or between the little village and the great town. It is a very rich and significant promise that the glory of the Lord is to rest "upon every dwelling," and all the commonest interests of life are to be lit up in its holy rays. The Eternal Light is to "keep our feet," and the "one step" is to be under his gracious direction and control.

Wasn't it Tyndale who declared that he bought a copy of Emerson "by revelation" and it brought to him bounty of fine gold? What Tyndale may have said half-jocularly has very true and profound significance. For such is the promise and teaching of the Word. We can be led from Cæsarea to Joppa by revelation. We can choose our calling by revelation. That is to say, God's holy light will penetrate our common judgments in common things. Unto the righteous there shall arise light in the darkness, and they shall know the mind of God. J. H. J.

Life Abundant

MONDAY, December 24. John 10 : 10. "I am come that they might have life, and that they might have it more abundantly." No more foolish error of belief has ever been entertained than that Christianity is not friendly to the largest possible meaning of life, that it cripples, enfeebles and limits life. Conversion is the thrill of awaking life. Christ has done more to broaden and deepen life, to enlarge it in all its dimensions, than any other since time began. Does it diminish the value of this life to know there is another? Surely not, if added to that knowledge is the conviction that our character in this life determines our destiny in that. Does it limit life to hold the things unseen to be more real than all things else, to strive for what is worth the most, the things that are to live forever? Does it contract our powers to be commissioned to disciple all nations? Is it a small thing to be taught the wide brotherhood of humanity? In these things is the very genesis of cosmopolitanism. These are what make life large. The absence of them makes life small. Those who deny these things or who are indifferent to them have no outlook, no freedom of mind and soul. What is life to us who have heard the voice of the Master saying "Come to me" and have followed? At once there breaks new light upon our path. Something stirs in us hitherto undiscovered depths. We learn, slowly, to be sure, but we learn, to feel a new pity for all pain, a new sympathy for all sorrow, a new kindred to all our fellow-pilgrims of the infinite. Our activities are intensified. We have a new passion, a personal love for an unfailing Friend. Christ is the name we love, and life describes a new circle around that circle, a circle whose circumference takes in a new heaven and a new earth. Our life has been made more abundant. C. C. A.

The Source of Power

TUESDAY, December 25. Isa. 40 : 29–31. "He giveth power to the faint; and to them that have no might he increaseth strength. Even the youths shall faint and be weary, and the young men shall utterly fall: but they that wait upon the Lord shall renew their strength; they shall mount up with wings as eagles; they shall run, and not be weary; and they shall walk, and not faint." We have all felt the magic power of a word of encouragement in moments when our physical strength was about to give out, and the success of our undertaking depended on our holding out just a little longer. Also our spiritual strength is at times tried to the limit of endurance. We imagine that it is impossible to bear up any longer under our hardships. Our last ounce of strength seems spent. And inward strength is much more valuable in every enterprise than muscles of steel and a stalwart frame. For such moments of exhaustion, when our spirit groans and the cry of anguish is wrested from us: Lord, help us, we perish! the answer is here ready. The Master who has set our task for us has also measured our ability. We perform it with power communicated by him, and he can increase our strength. A cheering word from him seems to infuse new energy into our tottering limbs. We seem to have been given wings to surmount the difficulties before us. When we feel that we are falling behind in the race that is set before us, when our hands begin to slip on the hold that we have taken, and we are conscious of nothing but our weariness, ready to give in and drop, the Master says: "Now is my time to be up and doing. I cannot permit my servant to lose his race. He is working at my task, and I cannot allow him to quit it unfinished."

Our trials must often reduce us to this state of utter helplessness, in order that we may the more clearly recognize the superhuman strength which is supplied by divine grace, and may ascribe the honor of our achievements, not to ourselves, but to the Lord who made us strong and kept up our courage.

The Fountain of Grace

WEDNESDAY, December 26. Ps. 45 : 2. "Grace is poured into thy lips." Jesus was full of grace and truth; his face was fairer than the children of men; his tongue like the pen of a ready writer. He spake as never man spake, with wonderful loveliness of expression, in picture parables and startling paradoxes. Hear him: If you would be great, be the servant of all; if you would be first, be last of all; if you would save your life, lose it; if you would be mightiest, be least of all.

How almost childlike is the simplicity of his language: "Come unto me, and I will give you rest." How brief and pungent his sentences: "Him that cometh unto me, I will in no wise cast out." Some orators have such large words, such long, labored sentences, that, as one has said, "You could travel all day in these long paragraphs without changing cars."

Christ, the fountain of grace, poured out its sparkling waters in pearls and diamonds of truth, whose luster fascinated his hearers and shines on undimmed forever. Preaching today should pattern more after the great Original. The heart that does not burn within itself cannot make other hearts burn. Bernard of Clairvaux was a marked example of a soul on fire with the spiritual force of love divine. His very face gleamed with celestial light. His presence was like an atmosphere of purity; his words were like grace dropped from his lips. His audiences were entranced and exalted as though by the power of Christ himself. The celebrated Abelard surrendered when Bernard began his great speech against his doctrines. Such is the power of an ambassador in perfect communion with his Lord. He reveals the visions behind the veil. He lifts the curtain hiding the eternal so we can see spiritual things, though it be through a glass darkly. Faith, hope and love are seen to be the real glory of the present and future life and the unsearchable riches of Christ become the only lasting reality. E. W. C.

Under Sealed Orders

THURSDAY, December 27. Heb. 11 : 8. "And he went out, not knowing whither he went." We know why Abraham was called out of Ur. It is easy to perceive the philosophy of history after four thousand years. But they who find the first paths across the mountains do not know the configuration of the country. They make the maps and we read them. The soldiers who fight in a great battle know little about it until it is over. It is easy for us now to see that it was God's plan to select and train a special race of people for purposes of righteousness; that some one man must be the father of a family whose descendants were to be kept apart from the heathen world, until at last, educated in the worship of God, in the apprehension of his spirituality, his holiness, and his love, they should be capable of furnishing the human ancestry of the Messiah. This was God's purpose in calling Abraham out of Chaldean idolatry. It was impossible for Abraham to see it, but it was not necessary for him to see it. He had faith in God, faith in the invisible world, faith in the future, faith in the hidden reason of his appointed pilgrimage. And so must we have faith in God, and loyally follow our Leader, who says, "What I do, thou knowest not now, but thou shalt know hereafter." C. C. A.

The Prince of Peace

FRIDAY, December 28. Isa. 9 : 6. "His name shall be called. . . . The Prince of Peace." Had the angels studied Isaiah when they sang the nativity of the Lord with their "Gloria in excelsis" and proclaimed "Peace on earth, good will among men"? Peter declares that the glad tidings which were announced at the birth of Jesus, and the whole Gospel which began to be preached soon thereafter, are things which the angels desire to look into. I Peter 1: 12. Did not Jesus mean to verify the cradle-song which the angels had sung for him when, parting from his disciples, he said: "Peace I leave with you, my peace I give unto you: not as the world giveth, give I unto you. Let not your heart be troubled, neither let it be afraid," and when, coming among them after his resurrection, he greeted them: "Peace be with you"?

Jesus is our peace: he has established the old relation between God and man which existed before that dark hour when man first rose in rebellion against his Maker. He has justified the demands of the holy God by his living and dying. God is at peace with all who embrace Jesus as their Advocate and Representative. His Gospel is a message of peace to every aching conscience. He removes the feeling of guilt that oppresses us in view of our manifold sins. With the inward peace of the soul which he bestows in our hearts we can live in a world of unrest. The person whose conscience has been sprinkled with his reconciling blood can rush into the din and confusion of the battle with the calm assurance that whatever is the outcome of the strife in which he must engage all is well with him. In the daily battle which he must wage for his existence and decent maintenance he is surrounded by restless men on every side. He is tossed hither and thither by adverse circumstances, but he retains his inward composure, walking with Jesus as it were on the sea that rolls around him. Jesus rules his inward life: he is the Prince who has set up his throne in the believer's heart; he commands the waves and winds that would rush into the heart: Peace, be still! and there is a great calm. This is a peace which the world cannot give. It is the greatest peace there can be. Without this peace every other kind of peace is of inferior value. W. H. T. D.

Going Forward

SATURDAY, December 29. Ex. 14 : 15. "Speak unto the children of Israel that they go forward." There was everything against the ability of the children of Israel to go forward—the high mountains around them, the deep ravines, the dark sea in front and the armed hosts of the Egyptians in the rear; but the angel of God's presence was with them, going before them and being their rearward, ever protecting from a pursuing foe and guiding to victory.

"Help thyself and heaven will help thee," is a wise proverb. Make the mighty venture forward toward your triumphant Leader; this is your only hope. Seas will divide, manna will fall; deserts open a pathway toward the Promised Land, and his cross will be ever your pillar of light. Your Lord has gone forward; will you follow in his train? Many voices call you; time says, "Onward"; opportunity and development say, "Onward"; God Almighty invites you. Angels beckon you; will you go?

The siren songs of sin call you backward, downward and hellward, saying, "Come to the ways of pleasure which you may enjoy for a season. Come that the spirit of evil may coil itself about your soul while you revel in his lust. Come away from enemies that hem you in on every side; you never will be able to go forward. Come back to the delights of Egypt."

Let us go forward to meet freedom, truth and purity; to overcome evil with good, unrest with peace, enemies with love. Be children of the light, waving the banner of the Cross and singing the songs of triumph! It is better and better farther on; the pathway of your pilgrimage will grow brighter and brighter unto the perfect day of immortal beauty.

"HOWARD CHASE"

By

Pastor Charles M. Sheldon

Author of "IN HIS STEPS"

SYNOPSIS OF FIRST INSTALMENT

HOWARD CHASE, a young Congregational minister, single, receives a call from a church in Red Hill, a village of seven hundred people in Kansas. After consulting with his classmate and chum, Roy Lennox, he accepts the call and prepares to leave with his sister Rose for his new field.

THE old grin had come back and Roy understood what it meant. He smiled, put his hand on Howard's shoulder, and the two stood that way a moment. Then Howard sat down again and said cheerfully:

"We can look over the field when you and Kate make that visit. Stranger things have happened. This is not all fiction. At any rate you know well enough what these three years have meant to me."

"I don't know that I do," was Lennox's reply. "I surely don't know what they have meant to me and won't know for a long time. If I ever amount to anything in the ministry it will be your fault. Can't you throw your mantle or something over me before you ascend Red Hill?"

"You will have the baptism of the Spirit some day, Roy. But not through money or easy-chairs or culture. I don't know how you will get it. I know it won't be anything of mine. Something far higher up."

Then silence came between them, a silence that Lennox filled in his own heart with something like the persuasive voices of abundant life. And that was the most affectionate silence the friends knew during the weeks that followed, including the graduation week, the marriage of Lennox, and the farewells as the young men separated.

A CONSIDERABLE part of Red Hill was down at the station the day Howard Chase and his sister arrived.

Deacon Burton, who had corresponded with Howard through the superintendent, George Clark, the local editor, and Bruce Carpenter, the high school principal, were the first to greet them and then introduce them to others.

Mrs. Burton, a woman of kindly bearing and attractive personality, invited Howard and Rose up to her house for the evening meal.

"I knew you would be tired with the long journey, but Mr. Burton and I thought you would not object to a meal with us, seeing it is so near evening, and then you can go right over to the parsonage as soon as you like. It's only two blocks."

Rose accepted for her brother and herself while trunks and bundles were being secured, and the little company moved away from the station, followed by a good many curious gazes. As Howard was giving his trunk checks to the local Expressman he heard one of the crowd say to the station Agent:

"Well, he's a wide-awake looking young fellow. Bet he was born in Kansas. New York never raised him."

Howard turned to the man and grinned as he held out his hand.

"That's a prophecy come true. I'll explain it to you some time. Introduce me to the Agent, won't you? And he'll introduce me to you?"

Both men laughed at something in Howard's manner, and as he gripped their hands he had them won to him in that immeasurable moment.

"Going to hear him preach next Sunday," said the Agent.

"Same here," said the Expressman.

Deacon Burton offered a word of apology as he walked up the street by Howard.

"I would have met you with the auto, but my daughter is using it this afternoon for a high school function. She is chaperoning the senior class at their annual gathering over at Maple Grove. But it's only a short distance to our house, and you don't look like an invalid."

"And I'm not one either. And if I was, the air out here is good enough to raise the dead. Your city hospital isn't crowded, is it?"

"I don't believe there's a dozen sick people in Red Hill," said Deacon Burton with a pleased look. "We have two good doctors and they're always praying for an epidemic."

"And did you ever see anything like the view, Rose?"

Howard turned to his sister and Mrs. Burton, who were behind.

THEY had crossed over the one business street and gone one block through an avenue shaded with great elms and soft maples. Looking up the street parallel with the business street there opened into view a rising swell of the prairie with what looked like a brown scar down one side, not a disfiguring brand, rather a distinguishing mark in the landscape.

Beyond this rising mound, off in the soft afternoon sunshine that fairly flooded the prairie expanse, stretched the broad reaches of varied shades of spring color dotted with rich farm land, wooded squares showing through the young foliage, comfortable farmhouses and surrounding buildings, while herds of cattle streamed out over the prairie pastures, and wheat and alfalfa spread great stretches like velvet carpet between the different quarter sections, and earth's redundant life flowed into that street of Red Hill in a flood of richness that Chase and his sister had never known before.

"I never saw anything like it!" exclaimed Rose, with delight.

"And that's Red Hill, I suppose," said Howard, waving his hand out toward the mound with the scar.

"Yes," said Deacon Burton. "After a rain it changes color. You can ask Professor Carpenter for the geological reason. We can leave your things in the parsonage as we go by, if you like. Save carrying them up to the house."

The parsonage was a neat, comfortable seven-room house, and Rose noted with woman's eye the evident preparation made by the church people. There were fresh prairie flowers in the sitting-room, and on the dining-room table a large vase of double lilac.

"Agnes took them from our bushes this morning. They were late in coming out. I hope the scent of them is not too strong," Mrs. Burton said to Rose, who was looking with approval over the simple but comfortable room furnishings.

"Our favorite flower," Howard answered as he bent over to inhale a deep breath, and then as he drew back said with his gravest manner. "Did you say Agnes? She is your daughter? A teacher in the high school?"

"Yes." They were moving out of the house and the deacon had turned to ask Howard if he cared to look into the church as they went by.

"By all means. Let's see it. I want to get acquainted with my surroundings. The sooner the better."

They went in, and Howard Chase paused at the end of the aisle and looked over the room where he was going to experience some of the strangest and most tragic events of his life.

IT was a pleasant room with a Sunday school annex on one side, which could open into the main audience. Capable of seating, the deacon said, two hundred and fifty people when it was all thrown together.

There was a plain pulpit on a platform only three steps above the pews. And an organ, with seats behind it for eight people on one side of the pulpit and on the same platform.

The room had been freshly painted and papered, and Howard noted with pleasure that the hymnbooks were new and the general appearance of the room spoke of care and pride in its keeping.

"We think our church is the best building in town," said Deacon Burton. "The Ladies' Aid have recently made some improvements. Mrs. Burton is president this year. She is responsible for the paint and paper."

"I got them both out of Mr. Burton's store," Mrs. Burton laughed, "at cost. I never knew before what profit he makes."

"I like the looks of this room," said Howard with quiet enthusiasm. "I believe I can preach in here. Do you have an organized choir?"

"Indeed we do!" Mrs. Burton spoke eagerly. "Agnes plays, and we have a double quartette of young people. You'll hear them on Sunday. They've been practicing for a month getting ready for your arrival."

Rose laughed.

"Howard doesn't know one note from another. But he does know a discord when it's loud enough, and he can see it if it is visible in the choir."

"You won't see any, Mr. Chase. The young people are very eager to please you. I'm only afraid they may be too eager. But we have some fine young people."

They went out of the church and walked two blocks farther to the Burtons'.

"Shall we wait for Agnes?" Deacon Burton asked his wife, as she waited for the minister and his sister to wash off the stains of travel before going in to supper.

"No. She said she did not know when she would get back."

So Howard and Rose sat down to a bountiful meal with the deacon and his wife, and Howard Chase did not see Agnes Burton until he saw her Sunday morning seated at the little organ on the pulpit platform only a few feet away. And that first sight of her changed the current of his whole life. It had so far been unmoved by the woman. The coming of Agnes Burton into Howard Chase's life was an event so far-reaching in its consequences, so deep in its influence, that no measure can be made of it.

HE had three days to prepare for the first Sunday in Red Hill. He spent them largely in helping Rose to get settled in their new home. There was not a great deal to do. The thoughtfulness of the Ladies' Aid Society headed by Mrs. Burton had anticipated most of the needs of a well-furnished home.

During these three days Howard met the other ministers of Red Hill.

Rev. Alfred Noyes of the Methodist Church met him in the post-office and introduced himself. He was an elderly man, hearty of manner, and gave Howard the first impression of rather positive assertion, of ecclesiastical dignity, but altogether friendly and cordial.

Rev. George Harris, the Presbyterian minister, called on him Friday afternoon. He was a slim young man, only two years out of the seminary, with a rather diffident but pleasant manner. Howard with his overplus of vitality sat looking at him all through his call, going over the possibility in the future of giving this brother boxing-lessons and straightening up the scholarly curve in his shoulders.

REV. HENRY GRAY of the Baptist Church was a type entirely new to Chase. Deacon Burton introduced him to Howard as Howard had stepped into the deacon's store to make some inquiries about the church.

"Meet Brother Gray of the Baptist Church, Mr. Chase, our new minister," Deacon Burton had said, and then had turned to a customer.

Gray shook hands and looked Howard over sharply.

"Glad to meet you, Brother Chase. Hope you'll have a successful pastorate here. But the field is somewhat crowded."

"Who does most of it?" Howard said with his customary grin.

The other man seemed all taken back at first. Then he laughed shortly and answered:

"Well, we all do, I guess. We have to in order to live at all. You'll probably get a good part of our congregations next Sunday. That's generally the case when a new man comes."

The Completed Chorus

By Louis E. Orcutt

BUT the Angel of Mercy was late. And this is the story of how it came to be.

"In eight days, as men count time, Mary, wife of Joseph of Nazareth, will be the mother of the Lord. The time of fulfilment is at hand. From among the host of heaven has been chosen a company who shall welcome the Son of the Highest, thus born among the children of men. As the Child is born, Gabriel will be above the village of Bethlehem in the land known to men as 'the land of Judah.' The others will gather about him and follow his direction."

Thus was proclaimed the order of the King. The angels gathered around the messenger to learn the names of those who had been found worthy of this most cherished part in the celebration for which Heaven and Earth so long had waited. When the list was told there was complete assent to the justice of the choice; for, with Satan and his rebellious host, Jealousy had left Heaven. As was expected, the Angel of Mercy was among those chosen. He talked with Gabriel at once and arranged to meet him on the appointed day on the road to Bethlehem. Then he was off about his never-ending task, the task of opening the self-blinded eyes of men to the burdens of their fellows, of tempering justice, of ministering to the sick, of smoothing the road for the feeble, of opening doors of welcome to the outcast, of feeding the hungry.

The Angel of Mercy, always happy, felt even deeper joy as he sought along the highways and hedgerows, in the villages and towns, for those who prayed for help. Was not the Kingdom of Heaven to begin on earth? Was not the hour foretold by all the prophets, the event expected since creation set the beginning of time in the midst of eternity, about to be fulfilled? Was not the Son of Heaven to be born a Babe in Bethlehem, to live among men until he had manifested to them the nature and the love of God? And was not he himself, the Angel of Mercy, to be above the manger throne to sing heavenly hallelujahs in honor of the earth-born Saviour of mankind? It was enough to make even an angel happier.

But what is this? A child cries. A tiny babe is lost amid a caravan. The angel moves near and whispers in the ear of a merchant whose ass, laden with rich and costly goods from the East, is shuffling slowly along the dusty trail. The man sees the child. Instantly he thinks of a chubby face back in Damascus. He reaches down, picks up the child and puts him on top of his pack of goods. Then he urges on the patient beast. Soon a hurrying figure is seen forcing his way back through the current of animals and people. He sees the child. He clasps the merchant in a fervent Oriental embrace of gratitude and takes the child in his arms. The angel goes on, happier still, for three humans are happy, two men and a child, and the angel knows that an anxious mother's heart will soon be happy, too. He walks on, for though as an angel he might fly, as the Angel of Mercy it is only by walking with men that he can gain full opportunity for his work. To a flying angel the world shows only its happiest face. Walking thus he enters a little village. He turns off into a narrow lane, enters a meagre courtyard and climbs down a short flight of stone steps.

It is as he thought. A widow prays. On a rude bench a boy of ten or thereabouts lies, breathing faintly. The widow's prayer has but one petition: "Lord, send us bread." The angel stays but an instant. Flying now, he enters almost at once the great hall of a home of wealth in the same village. A feast is on. The guests are gathered in the several rooms. The servants bear in trays of food, baskets of bread, pitchers of wine. The master of the feast has risen to bid them eat. But the Angel of Mercy stops before him and of a sudden his face pales. He calls a servant. He asks but one question. "What of the woman, Naomi, and the child?" "It is now five days master, since she came. She was refused and told to come no more," replied the servant. "Find them. Take food. Bring them with you." The servant is off at once, guided by the angel, and soon a cup is pressed to the lips of the child. His eyes open. The mother grasps the servant about the knees as she thanks God, the servant and his master in one breath.

Again the Angel is happy. He finds once more the road to Bethlehem. But the eight days are nearly gone, the sun is high overhead, and he is still far from the appointed meeting-place. He knows Gabriel cannot wait. He hurries, but again and again some human sorrow arrests him. The Angel of Mercy cannot pass, heedless, on his way. The day flies toward evening. The sun sets. The stars come out. The great star in the east, His star, blazes above them all. The angel flies again. He reaches the rendezvous, but Gabriel and his company are gone. Suddenly, above a lonely hill where sheep are feeding, he hears the voices of the heavenly choir. He hears the voice of Gabriel. Across the silent night rings out the shout of praise, "Glory to God in the Highest." The chorus answers, "And on earth, Peace." But the Angel of Mercy has reached his place, and the last strain of the chant is stronger by the measure of his voice as it pledges, "Good will to men."

And, so, through all the years, on every anniversary of the birth at Bethlehem, the Angel of Mercy has sung again, "Good will to men," and though the "Peace of which the other angels sang is still to be, good will is spread abroad from sea to sea, and men of every nation reach out hands of help to those in need, wherever need may be."

And, now, lest this little parable be lost, and lest we who today sing "Hallelujah," should forget that Mercy and Good Will are twins, let us remind ourselves that just now the currents of good will are strangely tangled in the world; that between some nations, which but a few short months ago were at peace, has come a blinding mist of hate, and that Hate has brought his twin, Misery, to dwell with men. But Misery has claimed many who have not hated, and this misery cries for mercy from those whose good will is not yet clouded by hate or by the lust of battle. Where the battle lines have swayed back and forth, where war and its ruin have swept whole lands, where exiles seek shelter in strange countries, there is misery—misery that is measured in the anguish of bereavement, the pains of sickness and the wasting of famine. And we, who at this Christmas time are blessed above the nations of the earth, must be the angels of mercy who will succor them.

The Kindergartner in South America

REV. GEORGE P. HOWARD, Sunday-school Secretary for South America of the World's Sunday School Association, says of his work in Argentina: "The biggest thing I have had on hand is a course of lectures to English-speaking Sunday school workers in this city (Buenos Aires). I always take samples of books and of the best literature along with me, and not the least important phase of these lectures has been the placing of the best books on Sunday school methods and child training in the hands of teachers and superintendents. As a result of my last lecture I received a visit on the following day from a wealthy lady, the owner of a large ranch about a night's journey from Buenos Aires. She is very much interested in the neglected natives and peons and their children. She is starting a Sunday school for them and was delighted when I was able to tell her what literature was available for these neglected children., . . . Every number of our Spanish evangelical church papers has an article in it on Sunday School Methods or Child Training. . . .

"As a sample of what I am daily called to attend to, let me transcribe a paragraph from a letter which I have just received from one of our native pastors:

"'I am writing to you to ask whether you can not help me with the Sunday school. It is growing, as you will see from the following list: From April 1 to last Sunday: 18, 22, 29, 30, 24 (rainy day), 29, 33, 38, 27 (election day), 35 and 46. I will divide the school in classes: grown-ups, about 7; boys and girls, about 37, and of these 37 about 12 are in the babe's department. I have made on the lid of my traveling bath a garden with a little pond in it and flowers and plants growing; little paths paved with little stones, little animals, and now I want some dolls and more animals to make the Garden of Eden complete.'

"There are two or three curious things in this letter that will be of interest to folks in America. First of all, they hold elections in this country on a Sunday. Next, here is a man, a bachelor, away out in the western part of Argentina, making an effort to teach a kindergarten class. Can't you see him on his hands and knees putting the animals in their places while he talks to the little brown-faced children about God's wonderful creative power? The crown of creation is lacking in that garden of Eden: he needs a couple of small dolls to represent Adam and Eve. Then the picture will be complete! We are inclined to smile at the whole situation, but remember: That is the first attempt at the modern kindergarten that has ever got to within 500 miles of that town, and I am glad that it was a Sunday school enthusiast who blazed the way. And what a hopeful situation there is in that town; how easy it is going to be for this secretary to sit down and give all sorts of helpful suggestions, for here we have a man who wants to know and who is trying to make good."

The Bible in a Persian Hospital

L. F. ESSELSTYN, a missionary in Persia, writes: "A Gregorian Armenian in the Meshed Hospital, El Persia, had been there for some weeks seriously ill with heart disease. One morning, when his condition was very bad, his wife asked that he be given the sacrament. The service was held in the surgery, and was attended by the sick man, his wife, all the missionaries and an Armenian friend of the patient. The medical treatment used was blessed and the man got better. A few days later the wife said: 'Yes, of course he is better. You read the prayers, and I told you he would get well.'

"Several men came into the waiting-room at a moment when I did not happen to be reading, and one of them said, 'Please read to us.' They often ask that the Bible be read. One morning a young sayyid said, 'In the book I bought the other day is a section called John. Won't you read to us this morning from that book?' Another young sayyid came in and his first words were, 'I want to buy a book.' I replied, 'Which book do you want?' He said, 'I want the book containing the story of the shepherd and the sheep.' A man who bought a Testament came in again and said, 'You cannot understand how much we are enjoying the Testament in our house. We read it every night. It is very sweet!'

"A Guklon Turkoman picked up a Bible from the table and read to a group of men, while another Moslem read to another group in another corner of the room. Such incidents have occurred scores of times. A man came in and said, 'Some people who have bought your books have talked about them a great deal at my shop, and I want to buy one.' I sold him a Persian Testament. A merchant said, 'A year ago I bought a Testament from you, and now I want a Bible.'

"It has become popular for all classes of people to buy the Scriptures, and even the illiterate buy them, saying they will get some one to read to them. We have been told repeatedly that the Persian Gospels are being used as textbooks in the native schools of Kuchan and Meshed."

Sunday School Workers in Brazil

THE activity of the Brazil Sunday School Union, of which Rev. H. C. Tucker is the secretary, was shown by a number of publications and certificates recently received at the office of the World's Sunday School Association. The Cradle Roll Department is thoroughly provided for. A letter of greeting and explanation is sent to the mother. The individual cradle roll certificate was neatly prepared and had places for the signatures of the department and school superintendents and also the pastor of the church. Other items of printed matter used in developing Sunday school activity in Brazil were of decided interest. There is a copy of Oliver's teacher-training course, "Preparation of the Teacher," of which over 1,200 copies in Portuguese have been sold. Practical methods work successfully in Brazil as well as in the United States as can be seen from the following letter from a town in Sao Paulo: "This church never had a properly organized Sunday school until 1915. The Lord sent the right man for the right place. There was a small class of children when he began, which increased year after year until the young preacher, Epaminondas Mello do Amaral, organized the Sunday school. He encountered great difficulties. However, the struggle ended in victory. Very soon members of the new Home Department transferred to other classes to be present every Sunday. Another notable change was that members of the church who had been backward and indifferent began to talk, pray in public and work for the cause. All in the school became interested in the public worship and the sermons. It is interesting to note the preponderance of children in the school who attend with regularity. There is one pupil 13 years old who walks eight kilometers even on rainy Sundays to attend the school; another nine years of age, son of a widow, walks five kilometers every Sunday. There are others whose parents are not believers who attend regularly without any encouragement from home. There is one negro boy 16 years old who has not missed a single Sunday in four years; he works in a factory and attends a night school assiduously."

Adventures in Neighboring

A Department for the Exchange of Experiences Between Rural Women Who Have High Community Ideals and Are Putting Them into Practice

Conducted by VERA L. CONNOLLY

ONLY ten days until Christmas! It seems impossible! And yet there is already a Christmasy smell in the air. Evergreen wreaths fill the village stores with a disturbing pungency; so that when we go in to buy thread we find (when we come out) that we have bought, instead, a pale blue fairy to hang, for some eager baby, on the town Christmas tree.

We leave the store with a strange gladness at our heart, and hurry to the town hall to give our fairy into safekeeping. There we find a great bustle of excitement. Young girls, with glowing faces, are making dozens of little tarlton sacks for candy, dressing dolls, or drilling children in their Yuletide tableaux and recitations.

Swept by the neighborly love back of the whole undertaking, we are soon promising to give cake or sandwiches, to help trim the great tree when it arrives, and to do all in our power to make this Christmas (despite separation and war clouds) a quietly happy one.

If this be your experience, this year, may the following letters from other rural women with ideals like yours carry to you, dear neighbor, a worth-while hint, a practical suggestion, or at least a cheery word of encouragement.

OUR first letter-writer—a resident of New York State—tells us about

A Christmas Tree at the Schoolhouse

Perhaps the story of a small adventure in neighboring that fell to my lot may be of interest to your readers.

One autumn I was teaching school in a rural district where the people were all strangers to me, and where every nationality and creed was represented. All seemed friendly, but no "neighboring" was in evidence, as each was engrossed in his own affairs.

As the holiday season approached, the school began preparations for a Christmas tree and a short program. The idea seemed to be new, and the children were enthusiastic. Soon they enquired shyly: "Do you care if outsiders come?" The spirit of the season suggested the "open door" for all. And how the people responded!

Did we wish to send to town? Some farmer's team was ready to go. We sent miles away to the county seat for holly. The big boys brought the tree from the nearby forest, and the girls strung popcorn and filled cornucopias with candy for the little ones. Persons of all sorts dropped in unannounced, to watch or help. We seemed like one big family.

Christmas Eve the tree was bending under its load, and the wood-fire filled the room with warmth and fragrance. People began to come, and kept coming until the sides of the room seemed to bulge. And these grown-ups listened while the children—their own children—told in song and story about the angels and the manger and the Babe. Tired forms relaxed; worried faces grew calm.

When the tree was dismantled, gifts from unexpected sources broke down many a barrier. New acquaintances were made; old friendships renewed. Many a buried talent was unearthed; we discovered orators, artists, musicians. But best of all we found, under cold exteriors, hearts eager for friendship and hungry for love.

I wondered, when I read this inspiriting letter, if some plucky little school teacher in your part of the country might not be trying to launch a similar plan and be badly in need of your cooperation? It may be that, by a very little effort, her simple school party can be turned into a heart-warming celebration for the entire community.

OR if a tree at the school does not appeal to you, perhaps this next celebration will. Certainly the birthday of our Master could not be commemorated in a higher, nobler way than this. But you shall hear the account of it and form your own opinion:

DEAR MISS CONNOLLY: I have enjoyed reading "Adventures in Neighboring," and I wish to tell you about the Community Christmas we had last year.

I live in a village of about 500 inhabitants. There are three churches: Baptist, Presbyterian and Methodist. It was decided by the Sunday school of one of these that it would be best to forego the usual Christmas festivities and do something for the Syrian and Armenian people who were in great need. The other Sunday schools were invited to cooperate with this one, and as a result the three Sunday schools worked together to make their joint celebration a community affair. Committees to look after decorations, recitations, music and the purchase and placing of the tree were appointed.

A large evergreen tree was placed in the center of the village square. The business men were visited, became interested, and had a large number of electric light bulbs placed in the tree. The tree was ablaze with light every evening for a week before Christmas, and was very beautiful. Of course every one wanted to know what it meant, and they were told of the "Community Christmas."

The exercises began on Christmas Eve, in the village square, around the Community Tree. The children sang two or three of the good old carols; there was a short speech by a pastor.

These services at the tree were short, as the night was cold and the ground covered with snow. Afterward, all marched to the Methodist church (that being the largest), where was held a Christmas service of song and recitations. A free-will offering was taken, and was sent to help relieve the suffering ones across the world.

We feel that this service helped us to be a little less selfish; fostered the community spirit; brought the three churches into close fellowship, and helped a bit to alleviate the suffering of others.

I was delighted over that Community Christmas, because of its sheer idealism. There was nothing selfish about it. Not even the customary toys and candy were included. It reminds me of a verse I have always loved: "It is the spirit that quickeneth; the flesh profiteth nothing."

And yet all villages are not quite ready for such a Christmas. Perhaps your village is not, nor mine. I'm sure we can each see our community as it is; just as a mother (who is not blinded by foolish pride) can see her beloved child as he really is and can rejoice in his growth.

THE following letter, which tells us about a Community Christmas celebration which has become a time-honored custom in a certain little village in Massachusetts, makes one fairly hear the children's gay little voices and smell the sweet pungency of a lighted tree:

DEAR MISS CONNOLLY: Your little corner in the Christian Herald is an inspiration. I enclose a contribution for it: an account of a Community Christmas.

For many years before Community Christmas trees were in vogue, an isolated rural town in Massachusetts was holding a celebration each Christmas. This little town boasts of but one church, one school, a voting list of less than twenty, and but forty homes, counting every kitchen chimney, whether it smokes for a family or for one person.

Yet, long before Thanksgiving dinners are digested, the children of this village are teasing for "a piece to speak Christmas." The teacher is well prepared, and soon plans for a beautiful Christmas celebration are under way.

In time, the Sunday school appoints a Christmas Committee. A subscription list is circulated, and the donations (to buy gifts for the children) are generous. After grave consultation, the Committee goes on an all-day journey to the large town near by, bringing home countless bundles and boxes. Meantime, at school, the children make a gift for each of the forty chimney nooks.

The young men of the town search for the best Christmas tree, and place it in the town hall, where busy hands load it with the gifts.

At last the great evening arrives, and the hall fills with happy people. A Christmas hymn is sung. The Sunday school superintendent reads the Christmas story. The pastor prays. The children sing and speak. The church choir sings a carol. The older boys and girls (now attending high school in the next town) add their bit to the program.

Then, with great shouts and stampings, in comes Santa Claus. Such clatter and laughter as there is! As we older people watch and listen, we cannot help but feel that the unity and love of these young people are a song of glory to God on high, and that from him descends a blessing to this little town at Christmas.

AND now, dear neighbors, good-by for another seven days, and as Dickens's Tiny Tim would say: "God bless us, every one!"

Priming Plugs

Sure Fire! Chance Fire!

Sure Start For Cold Motors

To sure-fire a cold motor, you must have gas right at the sparking point of the spark plug.

The one sure way to get it there is with Champion Priming Plugs.

The gasoline trickles right down the core and drips from the electrode—right where the spark jumps.

Don't take out your plugs—don't run down your battery or wear yourself out with useless cranking.

Put the gas where it will sure-fire.

Priming cups are better than nothing—they give you chance-fire conditions.

But they let the gas in at a point too far away from the spark plug.

If the gas vaporizes sufficiently to travel over to the spark, well and good.

If not, it will not explode.

And in a cold motor it does not readily vaporize.

The sure way is to put the gas at the sparking point through Champion Priming Plugs.

Safeguarding the Public's Health

FOUR thousand workers are employed and three hundred and eighty-three yards maintained by the Pullman Company throughout the country, for the cleaning of the cars, and stocking them with fresh supplies.

At the end of every trip all seats and cushions are unlimbered, and every cranny is vacuum cleaned. Mattresses, blankets and pillows are hung in the open air and sunlight. All used linen is removed and fresh linen neatly stocked; water coolers are sterilized with steam; the washrooms are cleansed with disinfectant solution.

At frequent intervals carpets are removed and renovated and the monolithic floor thoroughly scrubbed; the walls and ceilings are washed with soap and water. The polished steel interior of a Pullman is easily kept clean, and cannot shelter germs. Thorough fumigation is given every car regularly.

The laundering of bed linen and blankets is done according to the most exacting standards; the smallest permanent stain or scorching causes it to be discarded. Mattresses, pillows and all upholstery are frequently emptied and their contents renovated. There is probably no other public place where health and cleanliness are more vigilantly guarded than in the Pullman car.

So Far Away

By
MARGARET E. SANGSTER

"LAST year," a girl told me yesterday, "Eleanor—Eleanor is my chum—gave me a gold locket and chain. This year I'm going to give her a gold locket and chain, but there's going to be a sapphire in the locket."

"Why are you going to duplicate her gift?" I questioned. "And why the sapphire?"

"Well," the girl told me, "a sapphire is Eleanor's birthstone, and then, being jewel-set, my gift will be just a trifle better than hers. I don't want to let her get ahead of me!"

"I'm not going to give any Christmas gifts this year," said a woman in a trolley car to the one who shared her seat. "Not a thing!"

"I," said the seatmate as I listened, quite interestedly, for her answer, "I've got to give some presents, much as I'm trying to economize. So many of my friends gave me lovely gifts last Christmas!"

"I'm giving a hundred dollars to the Christmas tree fund," I heard a man say over his luncheon in a restaurant. "It's an awful graft, but one can't keep out of it without appearing mean . . . How much are you giving?"

And——

"My feet're tired already, an' it ain't nearly Christmas!" murmured a little clerk as she stood behind the counter of a busy store. "This giving stuff—it makes me sick! Giving—what d' they know about giving? Why don't they give a care to our feelings? It's trouble that they give us, by their Christmas spirit!"

So spoke the girl and the woman and the business man and the clerk. And it wasn't more than a week until the anniversary of the day when a star smiled from the silver-swept Eastern sky, and a Child was born.

The Child of Bethlehem

By Margaret E. Sangster

BORN, in Bethlehem, a little Child,
While the midnight quivered in the sky,
While a star shone with a silver glory,
While the angels sang a glowing story;
While a mother, gentle, never fearing,
Smiled at last, and slept, as dawn came peering,
Wistful-eyed, across the mountain high.
Even then the olive trees were blowing
In Gethsemane, where they were growing—
And, on Calvary, the gale was wild!

BORN, today, in Bethlehem, a Child—
Ah, but thunder shudders in the sky,
And the cannon moan their awful story,
And the fields are drenched with blood-stained glory.
Children with the Christ-Child's eyes are crying
In the war-swept lands, and women, dying,
Raise their tired eyes and pray—but weakly—
To the One who bore his cross so meekly.
Groping through the dark they are, and fearing,
Fearing death and—life. They are not hearing
Angel songs. . . . And if a star is glowing
It is wrapped in mist, and fades, unknowing.

BORN, in Bethlehem, a little Child,
Pure he was, and sweet, and undefiled.
And he gave a gift—his life he gave us—
Gave his life that he might help us—save us.
Yet men use his faith against each other,
"In God's name!" they cry—and kill a brother!
And the gentle mother, sad and sighing,
Knows that he is dying, ever dying. . . .
Knows that every shot and shell is tearing
Wounds that might have healed.
And are we caring?

God, but we have drifted far away,
From that Child of Bethlehem today!

A MOTHER wrote to me the other day. Two of her boys, she tells me, have gone to war. One of them has left a college course to wear the olive drab of his country.

"I thought at first," wrote the mother, "that I wouldn't be able to stand this Christmas. I sent my sons' boxes on the fifteenth of November, and then, well—I was through!

"Christmas was always the jolliest time of the year in our home. We always had a tree, and a goose for dinner, and we always hung up our stockings in front of the great fireplace on Christmas Eve. That's why the loneliness of this year rose up and choked me.

"I went down-town one morning to buy a few small gifts for my friends. And as I passed an attractive window I saw two small boys, obviously from our slum district, standing in front of it, their noses pressed to the plate glass. They were looking at a drum and a bugle that were placed together in a corner.

"'We could play sojurs great wit' dem, couldn't we, Jimmy?' said one of them as I passed.

"'Play sojurs.' My boys were playing 'sojur' over the sea, but I remembered the time when they had marched to the beat of a little red Christmas drum and chuckled over their amateurish bugle calls. I remembered. . . .

"That's all I've got to tell. Except that this Christmas, while my big boys are over the ocean being brave, I'm going to be brave, too, and be kind to the little boys in the city who need friends—the little boys who love toys just as much as my boys did when they were small. It will keep me from being too lonely, and it will make Christmas joyful again!"

I SAW a woman going down a department store aisle this morning. I thought at first that she was a commonplace enough woman, in a modest suit and hat; and yet as I watched the expression of her face I realized that she was not commonplace at all, for her expression was radiant with enthusiasm and good will. She smiled at the harassed floor-walker as she passed him, and she nodded to the girls behind the too-busy counter, and her kind hand touched the stooping shoulder of the little cashboy that hurried by. And as they smiled back at her the floor-walker lost his set expression, and the girls behind the too-busy counter looked a bit happier, and the little cashboy threw back his shoulders.

I moved up to the too-busy counter and waited my turn. Finally it came. As one of the girls attended to my wants I spoke.

"Who was she?" I asked rather indefinitely.

"She—" the girl seemed to know who I meant. "You mean the lady that smiled at us as she went through the store a minute ago?"

"Yes," I told her; "the lady who smiled as she went through."

"Why," the girl told me, "I don't know who she really is, although she's bought things here often. But she's so sweet that it's a pleasure to wait on her. She always wants to save us trouble, and there's a smile for each of us! Just before Christmas time it's a relief to see some one who is calm and has kept her temper."

And yet Christmas time, some two thousand years ago, was ushered in with the sound of angel voices singing. And the song that they sang was a song of "Peace! Good will toward men!"

The mother with two soldier sons has not forgotten the meaning of Christmas. I am sure that in her heart she can hear the echo of an angel song. And the lady who smiled has not forgotten either, for the light of a star glowed out of her eyes. And we—you, friends of mine, and I—must remember, too, that despite war and hard times, and gifts that are not Christmas gifts, Christmas is a real love day.

And we must remember the humble stable, and the shining sky that hung over Bethlehem, and the child who first smiled on the world from a manger.

A Red Cross Christmas

TO THOSE WHO FEEL POOR

I write as your brother.

We are a large family.

This world-war, made in Germany, against which we are fighting, has sent our incomes down and our expenses up.

The pinch hurts, but it is not going to kill us.

We still have enough and something to spare.

Though we feel poor, don't let us be impoverished by selfish fear!

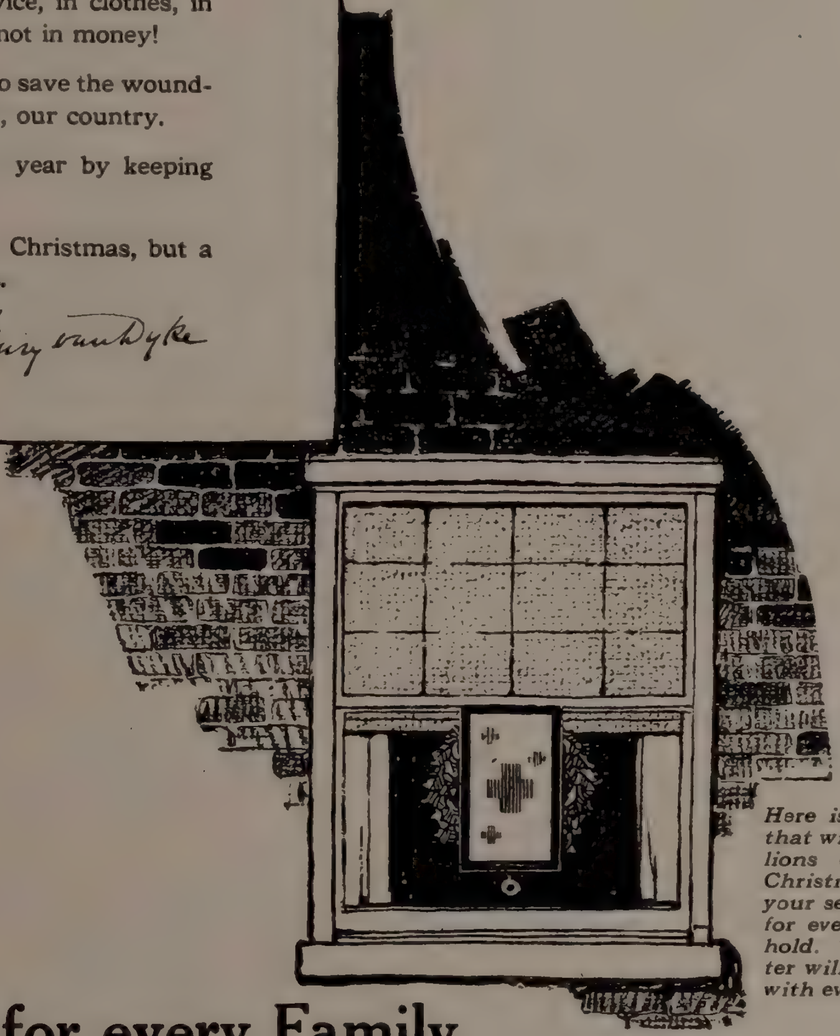
Let us save in food, in service, in clothes, in luxuries and joy-rides—but not in money!

Let us use that by giving it to save the wounded, the suffering, our friends, our country.

Let us keep Christmas this year by keeping up the Red Cross.

Then it will not be a poor Christmas, but a rich Christmas to our hearts.

Henry van Dyke



Here is a Red Cross Service Flag that will be in the windows of millions of American homes this Christmas. It must be in yours—your service flag with a little cross for every member of your household. The nearest Red Cross chapter will give you your flag—it goes with every one dollar membership.

A Service Flag for every Family to make this a RED CROSS Christmas of Mercy

ON this, our country's first Christmas, in the most terrible of all wars, there should be a Red Cross Service Flag in millions—fifteen millions—of homes at least.

When your membership dollar is sent on its errand of mercy, a work of relief, which is the noblest thing in the world today, is aided.

Your Red Cross does not ask you at this time for large contributions.

It asks you to become part of it. Your Red Cross asks you to be one of ten million more Americans to give one dollar toward world relief.

The merest outline of Red Cross work could fill this whole magazine—go to your local Red Cross chapter—have your rightful share of service. The Christmas spirit is the Red Cross spirit. Let a greater Red Cross be America's Christmas gift to our boys and our Allies.

What is Your American Red Cross?

An all American, largely volunteer organization devoted to practical service to suffering mankind—in times of peace as in times of war.

Congress authorizes it.
President Wilson heads it.
The War Department audits its accounts.
Pershing in France approves it.
It is working for your Army—your Navy—your Allies.
It is working for you.

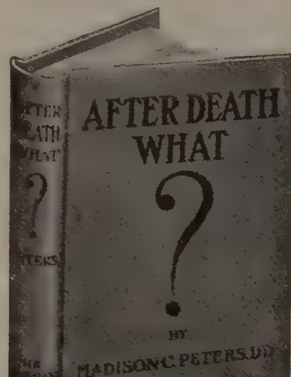
After Death, What?

By Rev. Madison C. Peters



WHEN the late Dr. Klopsch published "After Death, What?" some years ago, the book was received with tremendous enthusiasm and the editions published by him were soon exhausted. Successive editions were not published, yet the demand through the intervening years has been large. For this reason, we have thought it wise to bring out an entirely new edition of this wonderful book.

It is impossible to give more than the briefest glimpses of the rich character of the contents of this attractive volume. Among the subjects discussed are: "Does Death End All?" "Light After Darkness," "The Soul between Death and the Resurrection," "Heavenly Reunions," "The Joy and Comfort of Faith in Immortality," "Occupations in Heaven," "Our Children in Heaven," and many others, including poems of comfort and master minds on the life beyond. In addition to the above masterpieces of thought and literature, it contains a vast collection of golden gems from the greatest historians, philosophers, preachers and poets of all ages and nationalities on other phases of the future life.

Cap'n Abe, Storekeeper

A Cape Cod Story

by James A. Cooper

DO you like to read about doings on Cape Cod, among the quaint characters who inhabit that locality? Would you like to read of what happened to a high-bred city girl when she suddenly landed down there to take up her living with a relative she had never seen?

Would you like to read about a most perplexing mystery that came near being turned into a tragedy, and of how a man who was a rank coward at heart forced himself to play the part of a hero? In this volume, humor and pathos are well mixed. Many of the doings along the Cape shore are taken from life. Tender love scenes are not lacking; and there is high excitement when a great storm wrecks a vessel off the coast and it looks as if some of the loved ones might be drowned.

To meet Cap'n Abe, is never to forget him.

We will send a copy of "Cap'n Abe, Storekeeper," postpaid, together with the Christian Herald for one year, for.......... $2.50

COURTLAND looked at Pat in wonder. He was a constant surprise to his friend, in that he grew so fast in the Christian life. Pat was bringing his new religion to bear upon his work. He already had a devoted bunch of boys to whom he was dealing out wholesome truths beginning a new era in the school.

Pat and Courtland were much together these days, and one Sunday afternoon in late October, while the sun was still warm, they took the athletic teams a long hike over the country. When they sat down to rest Pat asked Courtland to tell the boys about Stephen and the Presence.

That was the real beginning of Courtland's ministry, those unexpected, spontaneous talks with the boys, where he could speak his heart and not be afraid of being misunderstood.

AS the year went by he came to know his fellow students better, and to find among them a few earnest, thoroughly consecrated fellows, most of them plain men like Burns, who had turned aside from the world's allurements to prepare themselves to carry the Gospel to those who were in need. Most of them were poor men also, and of humble birth, with a rare one now and then of brains and family and wealth, like Courtland, to whom God had come in some peculiar way. Some of them were going to foreign lands when they were through, had already been assigned to their mission stations, and were planning with a special view to the needs of the locality. Courtland felt an idler and drone among them that he did not yet know what he was to do.

THE men, as they came to know him better, predicted great things for him: wealthy churches falling at his feet, brilliant openings at his disposal; but Courtland took no part in any such discussions.

In February Burns had a farewell service in his church. He had resigned his pastorate and was going to China. Pat and Courtland went down to the city to attend the service; and Monday saw him off to San Francisco for his sea voyage.

Courtland, as he stood on the platform watching the train move away with his friend, wished he could be on that train going with Burns to China. He was to take up Burns's work around the settlement and in the factory section; to see some of his friend's plans through to completion. He was almost sorry he had promised. He felt utterly inadequate to the necessity!

Spring came, and with it the formal announcement of Tennelly's and Gila's engagement. Courtland and Pat each read it in the papers, but said nothing of it to each other. Courtland worked the harder these days. Both looked forward to the week that Tennelly had promised to spend with them. But instead of Tennelly came a letter. Gila's plans interfered and he could not come. He wrote joyously that he was sorry, but he couldn't possibly make it. It shone between every line that Tennelly was overwhelmingly happy.

"Good old Nelly!" said Courtland, with a sigh, handing the letter over to Pat, for these two shared everything these days.

COURTLAND stood staring out of the window at the vista of roofs and tall chimneys. The blistering summer sun simmered hot and sickening over the city. Red brick and dust and grime were all around him. His soul was weary of the sight and faltered in its way. What was the use of living? What?

Then suddenly he straightened up and leaned from the window alertly! The fire alarm was sounding. Its sinister wheeze shrilled through the hot air tauntingly! It sounded again. One! two! One! two! three! It was in the neighborhood.

Without waiting for a word, both men sprang out the door and down the stairs.

CHAPTER XXIX

"THE Whited Sepulcher," as some of the bitterest of her poorly paid slaves called the model factory, stood coolly, insolently, among her dirty, red-brick, grimed-stained neighbors; like some dainty lady appareled in sheer muslins and jewels appearing on the threshold of the hot kitchen where her servitors were sweating and toiling to prepare her a feast.

One of the boys from the lumber-yard down the next block had stopped to light his cigarette as he passed out into the street. He tossed his match away, not seeing where it fell. How long it crept and smoldered no one knew. It seemed to come from every floor at once, that smell of smoke and cry of fire!

Panic and smoke and fire! Cries and clashing of machinery thundering on like a storm above an angry sea!

The girls rushed together in fear, or, screaming, ran desperately to windows which they knew they could not raise! They pounded at the locked doors and crowded in the narrow passages, frantically surging this way and that!

THE fearful noise of machinery had suddenly ceased and been succeeded by a calm in which sound of rushing flames, the babble of the crowd outside, the gong of fire-engines, and the cry of firemen seemed balm of music in the ears. Water hissed on hot machinery and burning walls. It splashed inside the window and on the white face of Susie. It touched the hot hands of Katie as she lifted her friend nearer to the blessed spray. A shadow of a ladder somewhere crossed the window. Splintered glass fell all about her, and a hand reached in and crushed the window frame.

It was Pat who lifted out the limp Susie and handed her down to Courtland, who was just below, while Katie turned and looked back at the fearful pit of fire beneath her, knowing that in but a few more seconds, if help came not, she, too, would be a part of that writhing, awful heap! She saw the white face and staring eyes of the gray-haired woman who ran the machine next to hers lying beneath a pile of dead. She reeled and felt her senses going. Her hot hands clung to the hotter window-ledge. The flames were leaping nearer! She could not hold out—

Then a strong hand grasped her and drew her out into the blessed air, and she felt herself being carried down, down, safely, wondering, as she went, if the vine was roasted yet, or if it still smirked greenly outside this holocaust; wished she had strength to shake a mocking finger at it; and then she knew no more.

For three long hours Courtland and Pat worked side by side, bringing out the living, searching for the dead and dying, carrying them to an improvised hospital in an old warehouse in the next block. Grim and soiled and gray, with singed hair, blistered hands and faces, and sickened hearts, they toiled on.

TO Courtland the experience was like walking with God and being shown the way he might have gone, and how he had been saved. If he had accepted Ramsey Thomas's proposition he would have been a sharer in the sin that caused this catastrophe. He would have been a murderer, almost as much responsible for that charred body lying at his feet, for all those dead and dying, as if he had owned the place.

The whited sepulcher lay a heap of blackened ruins. Only one small corner rose, of blackened marble, to which clung a fragment of brave green to show what had been but a few short hours before. The morning's sun would see it, too, withered and black like the rest. The model factory was gone! But the money that had built it, the money that it had made, was still in existence to build it over again, a perpetual blind to the lawmakers who might have otherwise put a stop to its abuses! It would undoubtedly be built again, more whited, more sepulchral than before.

As he looked upon the ruin a great resolve came to him. He would give his life to fight the power that was setting its heel upon humanity and putting a price upon its blood. He would devote all his powers to the uplifting of people who had been down-trodden and oppressed in the simple act of earning their daily bread!

Ramsey Thomas, happening to be in a near-by city, and answering a summons by telegraph arrived at the scene in an automobile as Courtland stood there, grimed and tattered from his fight with death.

RAMSEY THOMAS, baffled, angry, distressed, wriggled out of his car to the sidewalk and faced Courtland, curiously conspicuous and recognizable with all his disarray. Courtland towered above the great man with righteous wrath in his eyes. Ramsey Thomas cringed and looked embarrassed. He had come to look over the ground to see how much trouble they were going to have getting the insurance.

"Oh, why—I," he began, nervously. "It's Mr. Courtland, isn't it? They tell me you've been very helpful during the fire! I'm sure we're much obliged. We'll not forget this, I assure you—"

"Mr. Thomas," broke in Courtland, in a clear, decisive voice, "you wanted to know a year ago why I wouldn't accept your proposition, and you couldn't understand my reason for refusing. There it is!"

He pointed eloquently to the heap of ruins.

"Go over to that warehouse and see the rows of charred bodies! Look at the agonized faces of the dead, and hear the groans of the dying! See the living who are scarred or crippled for life? You are responsible for all that! If I had accepted your proposal I would have been responsible, too! And now I mean to spend the rest of my life fighting the conditions that make such a catastrophe as this possible!"

Courtland turned, and in spite of his tatters and soil walked majestically away from him down the street.

Ramsey Thomas stood rooted to the ground, watching him, a strange mingling of emotions chasing one another over his rugged old countenance: astonishment, admiration, and fury in quick succession.

"Drat him!" he said, under his breath. "Drat him! Now he'll be a worse pest than that little rat of a preacher, for he's got twice as much brains and education!"

CHAPTER XXX

THE summer passed in hard, earnest work.

Courtland had been back at his studies several weeks when there came a letter from Mother Marshall.

Courtland opened it eagerly. Here at least would be a fresh, pure breath of sweetness. His soul was worn and troubled. A great loneliness possessed him when he thought of Tennelly, or when he looked forward to his future, for he truly was convinced that he never should turn to the love of woman again; and so the dreams of home and love and little children that had had their normal part in his thoughts of the future were cut out, and the days stretched forward in one long round of duty.

> DEAR PAUL, [it began, familiarly]: This is Stephen Marshall's mother and I'm calling you by your first name because it seems to bring my boy back again to be writing so familiar-like to one of his comrades.
> We've been wondering, Father and I, since you said you didn't have any real mother of your own, whether you mightn't like to come home Christmas to us for a little while and borrow Stephen's mother. I've got a wonderful hungering in my heart to hear a little more about my boy's death. I couldn't have borne it just at first, because it was all so hard to give him up, and he just beginning to live his earthly life. But now since I can realize him over by the Father, I would like to know it all.
> Of course, if you are busy and have other plans you mustn't let this bother you. I can wait till some time when you are coming West and can stop over for a day. But if you care to come home to Mother Marshall and let her play you are her boy for a little while, you will make us all very happy.

When Courtland had finished reading the letter he put his head down on his desk and shed the first tears his eyes had known since he was a little boy. To have a home and mother-heart open to him like that in the midst of all his sorrow and perplexity fairly unmanned him. By and by he lifted up his head and wrote a hearty acceptance of the invitation.

That was in November.

In the middle of December Tennelly and Gila were married.

IT was a cold, snowy night that Courtland came down to the city and took the Western express for his holiday.

There was snow, deep, vast, glistening, when he arrived at Sloan's Station on the second morning, but the sun was out, and nothing could be more dazzling than the scene that stretched on every side. They had come through a blizzard and left it traveling eastward at a rapid rate.

Courtland was surprised to find Father Marshall waiting for him on the platform, in a great buffalo-skin overcoast, beaver cap, and gloves. He carried a duplicate coat which he offered to Courtland as soon as the greetings were over.

"Here, put this on; you'll need it," he said, heartily, holding out the coat. "It was Steve's. I guess it'll fit you. Mother and Bonnie's over here, waiting. They couldn't stand it without coming along. I guess you won't mind the ride, will you, after them stuffy cars? It's a beauty day!"

And there were Mother Marshall and Bonnie, swathed to the chin in rugs and shawls and furs, looking like two red-cheeked cherubs!

Bonnie was wearing a soft wool cap and scarf of knitted gray and white. Her cheeks glowed like roses; her eyes were two stars for brightness. Her gold hair rippled out beneath the cap and caught the sunshine all around her face.

Courtland stood still and gazed at her in wonder and admiration. Was this the sad, pale girl he had sent West to save her life? Why, she was a beauty, and she looked as if she had never been ill in her life! He could scarcely bear to take his eyes from her face long enough to get into the front seat with Father Marshall.

AS for Mother Marshall, nothing could be more satisfactory than the way she looked like her picture, with those calm, peaceful eyes and that tendency to a dimple in her cheek where a smile would naturally come. Apple-cheeked, silver-haired, and plump. She was just ideal!

It was Mother Marshall who took him up to Stephen's room herself when they reached the nice old rambling farmhouse set in the wide, white, snowy landscape.

Courtland entered the room as if it had been a sacred place, and looked around on the plain comfort: the home-made rugs, the fat worsted pin-cushion, the quaint old pictures on the walls, the bookcase with its rows of books; the big white bed with its quilted counterpane of delicate needlework, the neat marble-topped washstand with its speckless appointments and its wealth of large old-fashioned towels.

"It isn't very fancy," said Mother Marshall, deprecatingly. "We fixed up Bonnie's room as modern as we could when we knew she was coming"—she waved an indicating hand toward the open door across the hall, where the rosy glow of pink curtains and cherry-blossomed wall gave forth a pleasant sense of light and joy—"and we had meant to fix this all over for Steve the first Christmas when he came home, as a surprise; but now that he has gone we sort of wanted to keep it just as he left it."

"It is great!" said Courtland, simply. "I like it just like this. Don't you? It is fine of you to put me in it. I feel as if it was almost a desecration, because, you see, I didn't know him very well; I wasn't the friend to him I might have been. I thought I ought to tell you that right at the start. Perhaps you wouldn't want me if you knew all about it."

"You would have been his friend if you had had a chance to know him," beamed the brave little mother. "He was a real brave boy always!"

"He sure was!" said Courtland, deeply stirred. "But I did get to know what a man he was. I saw him die, you know! But it was too late then!"

"It is never too late!" said Mother Marshall, brushing away a bright tear. "There is heaven, you know!"

"Why, surely there is heaven! I hadn't thought of that! Won't that be great?" Courtland spoke the words reverently. It came to him gladly that he might make up in heaven for many things lost down here. He had never thought of that before.

"I wonder if you would mind," said Mother Marshall, wistfully, "if I was to kiss you, the way I used to do Steve when he'd been away?"

"I would mind very much," said Courtland, setting his suit-case down suddenly and taking the plump little mother reverently into his big arms. "It would be great, Mother Marshall," and he kissed her twice.

COURTLAND first realized the deep, happy, spiritual life of the home when he came down to the dining-room and Father Marshall bowed his head to ask a blessing. Strange as it may seem, it was the first time in his life that he had ever sat at a home table where a blessing was asked upon the food. They had the custom in the seminary, of course, but it was observed perfunctorily, the men taking it by turns. It had never seemed the holy recognition of the Presence of the Master, as Father Marshall made it seem.

There was Bonnie, like a daughter of the house, getting up for a second pitcher of cream, running to the kitchen for more gravy. It was so ideal that Courtland felt like throwing his napkin up in the air and cheering.

Self-Poisoning—the Mother of Maladies

By R. H. Sinclair

IS THERE a single source—one sole cause – from which a majority of all human ills and diseases spring and develop?

Are we harboring, right within our bodies, a veritable "mother" of maladies, a poison distillery which Nature fights desperately but unsuccessfully to destroy?

An answer to this very interesting question was sought by the Royal Society of Medicine of London at a recent conference, and the subject of Colon poisoning and its effects was discussed by fifty-seven eminent physicians of the kingdom.

Startling indeed were some of the new truths established in this great clearing house of medical knowledge and experience. For example, it was shown that no less than thirty-six poisons, many of them virulent, are generated in accumulations of the body's waste matter retained in the Colon.

Already this new discovery has had a far-reaching effect, and those physicians who keep abreast of every advance in scientific knowledge are revolutionizing their methods for diagnosing and treating such disorders and maladies as headaches, backaches, vertigo, lassitude, indigestion, and their attendant complications—neurasthenia, mental and physical exhaustion, high blood pressure, kidney and liver disorders, skin troubles and many more serious diseases.

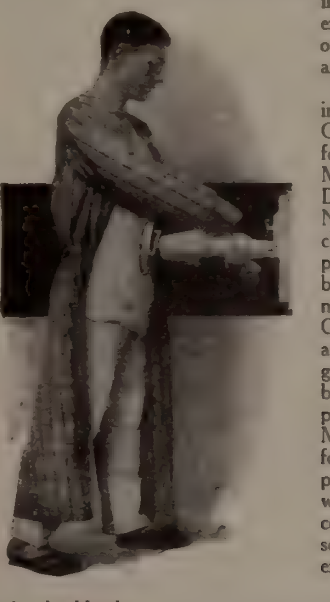
Again and again, in its earnest and often enthusiastic quest for cures, medical science has drifted far afield, only to discover that the simple, fundamental laws of physiology could neither be changed nor ignored. For as in every age, the simplest truths continue to-day the most difficult to recognize and to master.

The importance of dental cleanliness as a safeguard to health and protection against disease was understood by the ancient Egyptians. Strangely, it has remained for the present generation to find out that dental hygiene is no less essential to bodily health than is intestinal cleanliness. The perils presented by a clogged Colon, and the true character of auto-intoxication resulting from chronic constipation, are at last understood.

Auto-Intoxication (self-poisoning) is not a disorder of the stomach, as many have supposed, nor even of the smaller intestine. It is a condition that has its origin in the lower (large) intestine, the Colon, where processes of decay in its content of waste matter accumulations proceed rapidly. The poisons formed by this process are then absorbed through the mucous membrane into the blood.

Fortunately, in order to grasp and clearly understand the importance of this new scientific knowledge, a thorough knowledge of anatomy and physiology is not required.

Everyone knows how poisons in the blood act upon and affect all the organs and tissues of the body. Indeed, it may be said that disease, debility, nervous exhaustion and most minor disorders cannot exist and develop without these poisons to feed them, whereas Nature's work of repair is interrupted and stopped when such toxins multiply in the blood.



And anyone who has ever observed and inspected decayed articles of food outside the body, can readily understand how quickly the same process is set up and continued in a clogged Colon.

Professor Verchow, several years ago, in the course of hundreds of post-mortem examinations of the Colon, discovered that intestinal congestion prevailed universally, regardless of the immediate cause of death. Metchnikoff carried his investigations further, and was first to declare that old age and dissolution, and finally death, are consequences of chronic constipation.

Constipation is not a new affliction of the human race though its victims increase each year. The discovery of its true and sinister character, however, is new, and no sufferer from ill-health can fail to be interested in a full report of the facts now established, which can be had for the asking.

Proper, natural functioning of the digestive organs, and particularly of the Colon, has always, by Nature's intent, depended upon muscular strength of the intestines. But the habits of life of present-day men and women, with their sedentary occupations, afford no exercise for the muscles of the abdomen. The business man and the housewife cannot spare time from daily duties for physical recreation. Compression of the bowels with corsets and belts all but paralyzes the Colon muscles. The habit of carelessness grows on us, and we pay the price in sickness and often diseases that destroy health and efficiency. As a result most of us are half-sick most of the time and wholly unfitted for our best efforts.

Exercise in the open air, long daily walks, and the manual labor by which our grandparents easily induced normal, natural elimination of the body's waste matter by the Colon—these are impossible for us. The pressing necessity for some other means for stimulating the bowels and relieving Constipation has led us into habits hardly less pernicious and dangerous than Constipation itself. The active agents or physics, laxatives, purges, and other irritants, misnamed stimulants, are themselves virulent poisons, readily absorbed into the blood through the numerous membranes of the alimentary canal, and are universally condemned by medical practitioners except for emergency use. There is no such thing as a harmless physic.

A new method for restoring normal functioning power to the Colon has recently been perfected—a mechanical massage motor for vitalizing and stimulating the Colon muscles and giving immediate relief and permanent benefit. This new invention has been named the Kolon Motor.

The Kolon Motor is strictly scientific in its principle, and is designed to give invigorating massage treatments directly to the Colon. Having for its face a plate or disc, curved and shaped to follow the course of the Colon in the abdomen, it is operated by two revolving handles. When the motor is suspended from a wall, the patient's abdomen is placed against the plate, which, by the turning of the handles, is given an oscillating motion that imparts to the intestine either a gentle or a vigorous massage, as may be required. The effect is to stimulate the Colon to instant activity, while also exercising and strengthening it, and this local treatment is found even more effective than walking and other forms of bodily exercise. With Constipation overcome, Auto-Intoxication and its symptoms disappear.

A most valuable and interesting booklet, entitled Colon Cleanliness, has been published for free distribution by the Martin's Method, Incorporated, Dept. 1512, 105 E. 30th St., New York. No sufferer from chronic or intermittent Constipation should fail to read this booklet, which contains much new information on the subject of Constipation, Auto-Intoxication, and their effect on the system and general health. A copy of the booklet, together with a complete description of the Kolon Motor and the simple directions for its use, will be sent free and postpaid to anyone who will write for it, or simply mail the coupon below before the edition set aside for free distribution is exhausted.

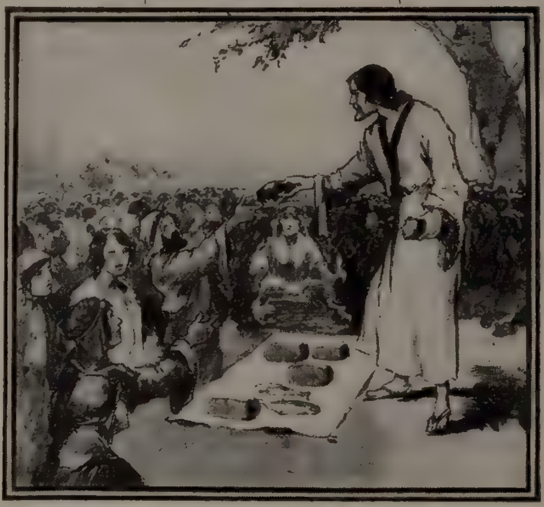
DO YOU CARRY A PICTURE OF THE BIBLE IN YOUR HEART?

Picture No. 6

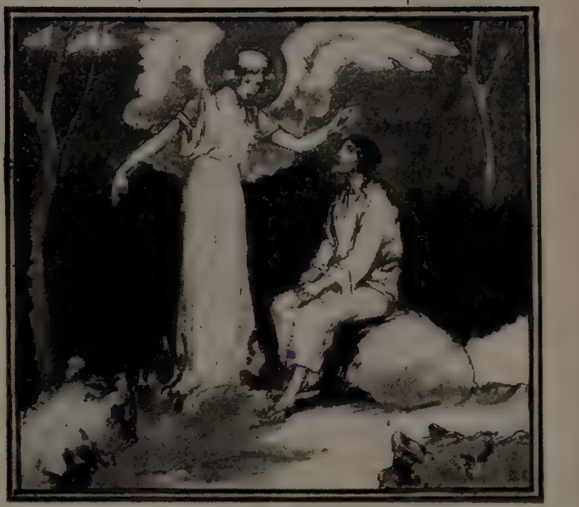


CAN you close your eyes now, and, in mental vision, see pass the bright processional of those scenes comprising the Beautiful Story? Can you, at once, and as part of the scene, think of the different verses that apply to them?

The ability to do this is one of the gains of the National Bible Picture Study, in which $5,000.00 in cash rewards will be given. Without being aware of it your survey of the 30 striking pictures in the Bible Picture series, your glance through the handy Reference Book to find the Bible verses that apply to each picture, your act of writing down each fitting verse in the Answer Book, will engrave these blessed scenes in your mind. This is a pictorial method of learning the word of God, which may well prove "a very present help in trouble." (Ps. 46 : 1.)

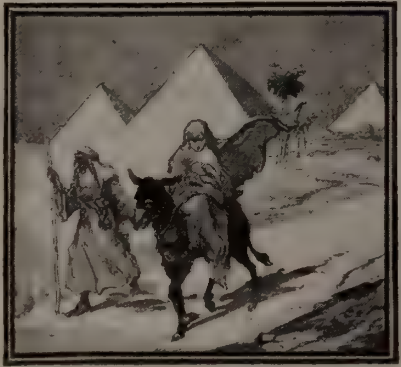
Yet while learning you will be enjoying; and your enjoyment will be so great that you will hardly realize how much and how deeply you are learning.

Picture No. 7

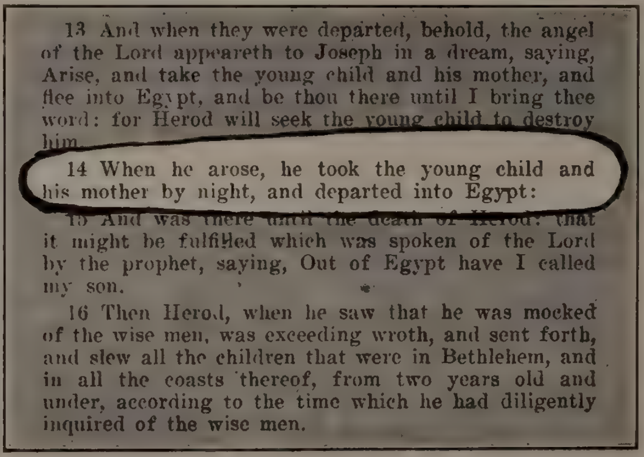


How You Will Compete in the National Bible Picture Study

FIRST You will look carefully at each picture, just as you are looking at the example picture shown below. You will note the scene the artist is endeavoring to portray, and your mind will begin to search your memory for the verse it represents.



SECOND You will turn over the pages of your Reference Book, International Bible Readings, and find among the 2,000 Bible verses there the verses the picture seems to fit best.



13 And when they were departed, behold, the angel of the Lord appeareth to Joseph in a dream, saying, Arise, and take the young child and his mother, and flee into Egypt, and be thou there until I bring thee word: for Herod will seek the young child to destroy him.

14 When he arose, he took the young child and his mother by night, and departed into Egypt:

15 And was there until the death of Herod: that it might be fulfilled which was spoken of the Lord by the prophet, saying, Out of Egypt have I called my son.

16 Then Herod, when he saw that he was mocked of the wise men, was exceeding wroth, and sent forth, and slew all the children that were in Bethlehem, and in all the coasts thereof, from two years old and under, according to the time which he had diligently inquired of the wise men.

THIRD You will write the verses you have selected in the Answer Book, just as you see this verse written here. In doing so you will also be impressing the verses upon your mind.

I, who have signed my name on the front and back covers of this book, submit the following Bible verses as individually fitting

PICTURE

I submit the verses in the order of their applicability to the picture. (Number each verse as you write it down; see illustration on page 2.) One, two, three, four or five verses may be submitted for each picture.

When he arose, he took the young child and his mother by night, and departed into Egypt. Matt. 2:14

Plan of the Bible Picture Study

OUR National Bible Picture Study is planned to teach Bible knowledge by the comparing of Bible pictures with Bible verses. We offer you a series of 30 pictures, two of which are published above.

We offer the official Reference Book, called International Bible Readings, one page of which is shown in the example diagram above. There are only about 2,000 verses in this book, chosen from among the 31,101 verses in the Bible. Select from this short list the verses which in your opinion are most appropriate for the pictures.

We offer the Answer Book, in which you will write down, to send in to us, your selections of the best verses for the pictures.

Those who submit the best verses for the 30 pictures, according to the decisions of a committee of eminent Judges, will be given the 1,001 cash prizes listed to the right.

Young People's Topics for December 30

Our Year of Jubilee

Epworth League Topic. Rev. 21 : 5; Cor. 5 : 17; Lev. 25 : 8-10

ACCORDING to the law of Moses every fifty years was a year of jubilee, a year in which captives were set free, a year in which land returned to its original holders and shackles fell from slaves, the bonds of debt likewise were broken and the nation started anew. The year of jubilee was a festival occasion throughout Israel; it was a year of thanksgiving, a year of new starts. Old mistakes were forgotten and old injustices righted. This year finds the world in the grip of the greatest struggle of the ages, in a struggle which President Wilson has characterized as the final battle for liberty for men and nations. Let us hope that 1918 may indeed be a year of jubilee, a year which will bring new liberties to nations, and which will give new validity to righteousness, both personal and national, a year which will right all the wrongs that have kept international relations for generations in a state of strain, and which will give to every people, race or creed a clear title to that which by right should be its own. But let us not forget that 1918 can only be a year of jubilee, a year of world-wide liberty if the events of the year are shot through with Christian love and Christian purpose. Even should peace come, unless it is a peace which can be made in the name of the Christ, it will have little permanence and there will be no jubilee. It remains for the Christian people of the world so to grip the movement of events that as the year unfolds there will be a steady progress toward liberty and justice, toward righteousness and restoration, toward freedom and the consummation of the jubilee.

Our Duty to Mexico

B. Y. P. U. Topic. Rom. 1 : 14-17

MEXICO, to many of us, is merely a land where half-educated greasers indulge in intermittent revolution. Some of us know that it has rich mines and richer fields; still others know a little of its history from the days of Montezuma to those of Madero. Few of us realize the full challenge of Mexico's need. Few of us appreciate the depths of ignorance and superstition into which her people have been plunged, or from which at least they have never been given the opportunity to ascend, and fewer of us know the true heart of this land whose people hunger for the light of education and the greater light of the Christ. We have a duty to Mexico. Leaders may secure material and helps for the treatment of this topic by sending 10 cents (to cover postage) to Rev. John M. Moore, 23 East Twenty-sixth Street, New York City.

Planning for the Future

Christian Endeavor Topic. Matt. 25:1-13

PLANNING is great fun. Air castles, the fairy structures of our earlier dreams, become in time the concrete objects of the struggles of our later years. Plans are necessary to accomplishment. No great achievement ever just happened. Every victory of armies, of builders or of mechanical skill has first been mapped out carefully by some master mind. For every building we must have a foundation. For the buildings of the years to come we have our foundation in the experience of the years that have gone. If, in the past, we have failed at any point, we can plan to bridge that weak point with stronger materials in the building of the future. If in the past our building of hope has fallen about our ears, we can make our new building stronger and brace it more thoroughly. We are building life, and the weak spots in life are bridged by the Saviour's love. The shaky structure of our humanity is braced and made secure by the strength of his righteousness. Our faults are covered by his perfections. Let us then, as we plan for the future put Christ first. Let us be sure that on every page of the master-drawing there is the imprint of his name, and that every step in the completion of the structure is taken in his spirit. Built thus, our plans for the year will become a building for eternity.

Billy Sunday and Los Angeles

BILLY SUNDAY has come and gone, and the great event for Los Angeles is only a memory. Everywhere one goes one hears the question "Did you hear Billy?" and then, following at once: "What did you think of him?"

In order to answer the first question, it is necessary to consider the city of Los Angeles. As a matter of fact, there is no city in the United States that has such a variety of creeds. All the religions and offshoots of the Christian belief find followers here. Most of the disciples of the "isms" were frankly opposed to the evangelist. Then, again, there is no doubt that a good many of the churches had fallen into a state of comfortable belief that everything was all right—the sun was shining, everybody was happy, and why worry? I'm not talking about the pastors. Nowhere on the American continent will you find any harder-working heads of churches than in Los Angeles. But the people themselves—that was the trouble. There was no lining up into a great army of Christians and workers to fight for Christ. But if you ask: What do the Christian people think of Billy Sunday? You hear the almost universal shout of praise.

And the non-Christians? Well, that depends upon whom you ask. I asked a saloonkeeper the other day, and he was furious. I asked a business man, and he was very strongly pro-Billy. I asked a clerk, and he said that he went to church on Wednesday night for the first time in ten years.

Did he do any good? Undoubtedly he did, but the best of his results won't show this week or next. They will show at the next church census, however. When 26,752 get interested enough in church matters to "hit the trail" and give their names to the secretary in charge, there is going to be some result. Only one thing could spoil it, and that is if the pastors do not follow up the converts after Mr. Sunday leaves—and Los Angeles pastors are not that kind. The majority will go to church. It is up to the church people to keep them coming.

When the audience of 16,000 people gave a farewell cheer in the big Tabernacle, it marked a new spiritual genesis such as Los Angeles has never experienced: a beginning of bigger, better things: a spirit among the churches such as they have never before known. Is Los Angeles the better for Billy Sunday? We do not fear the answer. Ernest H. Barbour.

Among the Workers

THE Grand Avenue Methodist Episcopal Church of Kansas City, Mo., which has made a notable record as a very much alive organization, has adopted a plan which appears to be successful for the building up of its young people's work. In addition to the usual devotional meeting of the Epworth League, the League holds a Sunday evening social hour to which all young people are invited. The social hour begins at five o'clock and refreshments are served at 5.45; a brief prayer service follows at 6.30 with the usual devotional meeting at 6.45, lasting forty-five minutes and followed by the evening preaching service.

THE North Orange, N. J., Baptist Sunday School holds an enviable record for Sunday school attendance. One of its members, Mr. Alonzo L. Keys, has not missed a Sunday in 21 years. Another, Miss Elizabeth Hills, has missed only one Sunday in 18 years. Messrs. E. S. and C. H. Frazee have 17 unbroken years, Mr. Frederick Codey 15 years, Miss Olive Frazee 12 years, and Miss Dorothy Bergen 9 years without missing a Sunday. On the honor roll, which contains 59 names of persons who did not miss a Sunday in 1916, are 3 with 8 years to their credit; 4 with 7; 3 with 6; 2 with 5; 7 with 4; 7 with 3; 12 with 2 and 14 with 1.

TWO trained Christian nurses (women) are wanted for pioneer community work in Kentucky. Applications addressed to the Christian Herald will be forwarded.

Agricultural Possibilities. Blinks was always in an impecunious state. His bill to Mr. Dunn had been running for several months.

"But," said Blinks, "you can't get blood out of a turnip."

"True," retorted Mr. Dunn, "but the law has been known to get blood out of a beat."

is rather to be chosen than great riches," says Proverbs.

Every reader of the "Christian Herald" knows the value of a good name—a reputation for honor and upright dealing with his neighbor.

The "Christian Herald" is just as careful of its good name as you are. That is why it does not permit any advertiser of doubtful character to offer his goods through its columns.

Hundreds of advertisers would pay a premium if we would let them talk to our family of 300,000 subscribers. But — we have chosen a good name in preference to great riches.

You can safely confine your purchases to the merchandise of "good name" offered in this paper.

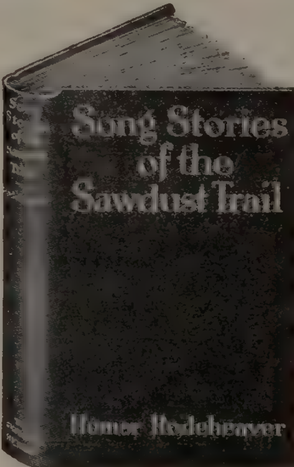
Song Stories of the Sawdust Trail

By HOMER RODEHEAVER

Billy Sunday's Tabernacle Choir Leader



You can sing the songs, for Rody's book gives them all in full, words and music, ready for the piano or organ.

Homer Rodeheaver, who, as everybody knows, is Billy Sunday's choir leader, and who has a wonderful gift like that of Sankey, has written a book with the attractive title "Song Stories of the Sawdust Trail," to which Billy has furnished this glowing preface:

"It is a pleasure to endorse the songs of Homer Rodeheaver. They have reclaimed, and redeemed, and remade the lives of thousands of men and women. The effort to tell, in human story form, the experiences of new birth that have resulted from these songs in his book, "The Song Stories of the Sawdust Trail," should do a tremendous service for the Kingdom."

W. A. SUNDAY."

Who can measure the power of Gospel Song to win hearts for the world's Redeemer? "Rody" in his book tells the story of his most famous songs—of which the words and music are familiar to hundreds of thousands of Americans who have listened with eagerness and delight to his singing and who have joined in the choruses. And each song has an individual history of its own. He tells how a humble, homekeeping woman, striving to "do something" for God, made herself and multitudes of others happy by writing the four simple, touching verses which the world knows as "Brighten the Corner Where You Are," and which radiate the finest kind of practical Christian teaching. He relates how another song, "My Father Watches Over Me," sung at a mission service, called a poor, sin-sick criminal and wanderer back to Christ and happiness. "Molly and the Baby," another of Rody's favorites, won a poor struggling drunkard back from his cups, and his evil associations, to his wife and family, and tells how all his former happiness was restored.

The Story of the Millionaire

Very dramatic and touching is the story of the song, "His Love is Far Better than Gold." A millionaire at sixty lost his fortune in speculation. All his beloved wealth, his idol and his god, was gone irretrievably. The crash of his fall shook the market. He went insane and wandered from city to city, a beggar. One day the conviction came to his clouded mind that there was something more precious than gold. He couldn't tell what it was, however. Passing a mission, he heard a voice singing words that almost seemed like a divine answer to his heart's question. He entered, and listened to the song to the end. The vision had come. God touched his heart, and step by step he won back position, influence, wealth, but all were now consecrated.

There are many other songs, each of which Rodeheaver invests with a history of its own. Among them are "Counting the Cost," "If Your Heart Keeps Right," "Mother's Prayers," "Sweeter As the Years Go By," and "I Walk With the King." One that has a unique history is "The Brewers' Big Horses"—the simplest and homeliest of the lot, and the most amusing. You'll laugh with delight as you read how the brewers' horses and their driver, under orders from the brewers themselves, did actually try to break up a parade given in honor of the evangelist, and what happened.

You want to know these Gospel Songs and their stories, as Rody tells them. They have helped uncounted thousands; they will help you.

We will send a copy of "Song Stories of the Sawdust Trail," postpaid, together with the Christian Herald for one year, for $2.40

Or, we will send a copy to present subscribers as a reward for sending us one new yearly subscription to the Christian Herald with $2.00

God's Redeeming Love

International Sunday School Lesson for December 30

Ps. 123, 124 A Review Lesson

By REV. GEORGE D. ALLISON, Ph.D.

THIS week we must do more than simply look over our quarter's Scripture study; we ought to strike off a spiritual balance sheet of the year's work. Of course, we must not do this in any bookkeeping spirit, for you cannot keep a ledger of the soul. But surely we need to be stricter with ourselves and ask whether we have wasted our opportunities and our time, or have grown in spiritual stature and in Christian efficiency. Can we use the Bible more practically? Has it reached our hearts and made us better men? Have we imparted to the children under our care the great principles of conduct and of motive that the religion of the Bible inculcates?

The Music of the National Religion

One of the features of the period we have been studying was the development of sacred music, just as in later periods of religious awakening. Most of the great psalms of the time are national rather than personal. We have studied the 85th and the 126th Psalms, with their ecstasies of joy over the return from captivity. In the 103d, our great Thanksgiving Psalm, we have a more individual note in its key-word, "Bless the Lord, O my soul." But soon the writer's thought sweeps on to national blessings, and thence to God's care for all mankind. What a picture of God it presents! This ancient Jew has portrayed the universal Father, who heals, forgives, delivers, loves with everlasting love!

Our reading for today consists of two other songs, which are quite possibly of this time, though some students incline to put them at a later crisis. The 123d ascribes the mighty deliverance to Jehovah alone. The poet pictures Israel caught in a net and fluttering like a frightened bird. But suddenly, powerful fingers tear open the snare, and the astonished captive is free! It was at first almost too good to be true. Only Jehovah, Maker of heaven and earth, could have accomplished it.

Psalm 124 reflects a more settled time. The confidence of the godly is still steadfast. But some men of Israel have erred, probably through lack of faith, and are walking crooked paths. The singer invokes the divine blessing upon the upright, and warns the irresolute that they will be reckoned with the transgressors. He closes with a benediction upon the beloved community.

The Figure of Ezra

In post-exilic Judaism the figure of Ezra loomed large. He became an ideal for the nation and almost a personification of the best of the new priests and scribes who were so devoted to the Law of Moses, to revealed religion, and to the nation as a chosen vessel of God. We see now that the era of priest-rule was invaluable in preserving the deposit of truth from the old days. The scribes were the conservers of the words of the prophets and of the sacred Scriptures in general.

But before we pass on, we must consider the defects of scribism and understand why Jesus said, "Woe unto you, scribes." For the same tendencies reveal themselves in the Church in every age. In all ages there has been a natural antagonism between the priest and the prophet, the scribe and the seer, and we must discern clearly that the great truths of the Bible come from the prophets and the seers, not from priests and ecclesiasts. Even Ezra brought nothing new.

Nehemiah is the ideal patriot of the Old Testament, giving up ease and position to go a thousand miles across the desert to a ruined fatherland. Yet he was not even born there, though the tie of race was strong. He makes us ask ourselves how far we would go out of our way to serve our generation.

Notice how Nehemiah's project was derided, opposed, just as every great enterprise in the world. So is our labor on the walls of Zion, as we seek to build the New Jerusalem in youthful hearts. But we see now that Nehemiah's work in rebuilding the city and its walls was as necessary in its way as Ezra's. It provided the physical and social basis for the idealism of Israel to continue. So we need today national power, organization of resources, an intense loyalty to our nation. This, too, works for the coming Kingdom.

The Year's Work

Now, then, have you added Ezra and Nehemiah to your boys' and girls' list of heroes—men worthy to stand with Luther and Washington? Will they never forget the man who loved the Bible and the man who loved his country? Have you, teacher, with the opportunity of studying conscientiously, caught the spirit of consecration, so that you are better, nobler, larger-hearted, more devoted to the public good?

Did the third quarter give you a firmer grip on Israel's history, not as a matter of mere names and dates, but as showing how the Almighty deals with nations and with men? Then it has helped you to face your problems and your country's today. Look back over your notebook at Hezekiah and Josiah and Ezekiel, and then see if you find their spirit in the President's messages and the pronouncements of the Churches of Christ and the Y. M. C. A. We ought also to be familiar with our modern prophets, our American heroes; and our scholars should know what men like John R. Mott, Robert E. Speer and Frank Mason North are saying.

Another year of Bible study ended, and we are farther on than we were a year ago. The time was well expended. Shall we not make one of our New Year resolutions a pledge of still more regular, faithful, thoughtful inquiry into the Wonderful Book? Let us enlist all our faculties and draw upon all our resources. We are about to enter upon a new study of the words and deeds of the Christ. From that inexhaustible source we shall find new light breaking forth, new challenges to our consecrated abilities, new privileges of communion.

Sunday School Methods

BY FRANK L. BROWN, Joint General Secretary, World's Sunday School Association.

The Teachers' Biggest Problem Solved

WHAT is your biggest problem with your class? What makes your work as a teacher difficult? Why are you so often discouraged?

Is it not because your scholars come to the class uninterested in the lesson, with no familiarity with it, and no week-day preparation for it? If you could discover some plan by which they would not only come with a knowledge of the lesson, but would be asking questions about it, would you not have wings for your work?

Well, the answer to these questions is the new Christian Herald Bible Picture Contest as applied to the Weekly International Uniform Lessons and the Golden Texts and Daily Bible Home Readings for the lessons, beginning with December 2 and continuing for some months. The plan itself was explained in a recent issue. I want to suggest here the practical ways in which the teacher can use this plan to make the lesson full of interest for the scholars.

1. Any teacher or scholar can secure from the Christian Herald the little book containing the full text of the lessons and the daily home readings for these months and the Bible pictures. He can begin any time before the end of the contest to guess what texts fit most closely the Bible pictures.

It will be a good plan for the teacher to secure a set for each scholar of the class, where the class is of the Junior or Intermediate age. As an investment, this will pay big dividends in setting the scholar on fire for lesson reading and text searching. Adult Bible classes will have an equal interest. They can easily arrange through the teacher, or directly with the Herald, for the material.

2. The fact that there is a series of substantial cash rewards for those who make correct answers in the contest supplies an incentive which will appeal strongly to young and old.

3. Twelve of the pictures will be chosen from the lessons themselves, and eighteen from the Daily Bible Home Readings. This will cause scholars to read all of the lesson texts and all of the Daily Home Readings, which, of course, are side-lights on the lessons.

4. The fact that these pictures do not come in connection with particular lessons will cause the searching over and over of all of the lessons and Home Readings for these months. This will make the whole lesson material very familiar and interesting for both preview and review.

5. The fact that the pictures may be chosen at times from the Golden Texts as well will help the teacher who emphasizes the memorizing of these texts. These texts are printed in full in the Christian Herald lesson booklet referred to.

6. One of the teacher's greatest objectives should be to encourage the scholar to search the Scriptures daily. The Christian Herald plan supplies the daily text for this purpose, and the habit of regular reading thus formed will be a great boon to the scholar in all his after years.

7. The plan will so interest the parents of the scholar that they are likely to be become the teacher's assistants in home study of the lessons.

8. The teacher can meet the class weekly at home for a lesson exploration tour, using these Christian Herald lessons and Home Readings as a basis. A map can be drawn by one of the scholars, showing all the places spoken of in the lessons. Another can write names of all the persons spoken of. Another can tell the happenings at those places. This will not only help in the Sunday's lesson, but, what is most important, this lesson will be seen to be part of a larger whole.

9. The application of the lesson to conduct will not be difficult whenever there is such a clear appreciation of the lesson facts as this plan will give.

I would suggest that every teacher, scholar, superintendent, Home Department superintendent, or visitor write at once to the Bible Picture Contest, Christian Herald, Bible House, New York, for the particulars of the plan. The fact that forty thousand participated in a similar Christian Herald plan recently indicates its fascination and helpfulness.

We shall show how the plan will help others than teachers in other weeks.

Our Sweet Tooth

THE sugar used for making candy in the United States, according to the best information, is sufficient to meet all the requirements of England under the rationing standard.

If the United States would cut out candy, the sugar saved would more than meet the requirements of France.

If half the sugar used in candy in this country in 1917 could have been saved, it would meet the requirements of Italy for a year.

The money spent for candy in the United States in the past year is nearly double the amount needed to keep Belgium supplied with food for a year.

Of the total sugar consumption of the United States, about one-third goes into various foodstuffs, including confectionery, while the remainder is consumed as sugar. The sugar employed in confectionery is estimated at 150,000 to 500,000 tons per year.

The confectionery business of the country, measured by the value of its product is about two-thirds as large as the butter business, a little less than one-third as large as the wheat flour business; slightly larger than the canning and preserving of fruits; and about two-fifths as large as the bakery business.

A Few Letters Showing the Spirit of the Contributors

November 13, 1917.

DEAR CHRISTIAN HERALD—I read an article in your paper concerning the sufferings of the widows and orphans in Palestine and Syria. Consequently the Bethel Sunday School decided to send them a contribution instead of giving Christmas presents this year. Enclosed is $38.79. Send it where you think it will be needed most. We hope and pray it will reach them safely.

Respectfully yours,
Titusville, Pa. MRS. PERILLA HUMMER.

November 15, 1917.

DEAR CHRISTIAN HERALD—Please find enclosed $5 to be used for relief of widows and orphans suffering from the war. You will know where it is most needed. I wish it were more, but this we gladly give with our prayers. Yours sincerely,

MR. AND MRS. ALEX. CRAISE.
Denver, Colo.

DEAR CHRISTIAN HERALD—Enclosed find $1 for "War Widows and Orphans Relief Work." While I cannot visit these poor people personally, this seems one way we can "visit the fatherless and widow," which is "pure religion, undefiled." I wish I could afford to send a great deal more. Hope this mite will relieve some suffering and rest some soul. Yours "In His Name,"

Bloomfield, N. J. A. C. ROBBINS.

Questions and Answers

INQUIRER, Richmond, Va. The problem of an independent Jewish State in Palestine is apparently not generally understood. A writer in the Boston Transcript says on this subject, that the Jews of America favor an independent Jewish State in Palestine, with a guarantee by the great nations, including the United States, and that this is the view advocated by the Jewish Congress. The same authority states the aims of the Jewish leaders here and elsewhere to be these: to create a national home for the Jews and thus bring them into the world family of nations; to provide a refuge for oppressed Jews, and "in cooperation with Christian nations, to make of Palestine such a resort as is to be found nowhere else"—a center of world attraction by reason of its holy places, sacred associations and past history. Of course, there is a religious program behind the whole movement, but that will develop in time, as the Christian nations are led to understand the great significance of Palestine being restored to its ancient people, after centuries of control by an infidel power. One of the earliest results of its restoration is expected to be a period of high development on modern lines, which will transform the Holy Land, reviving its ancient glory and beauty, so that the nations will literally "go up" to worship and admire.

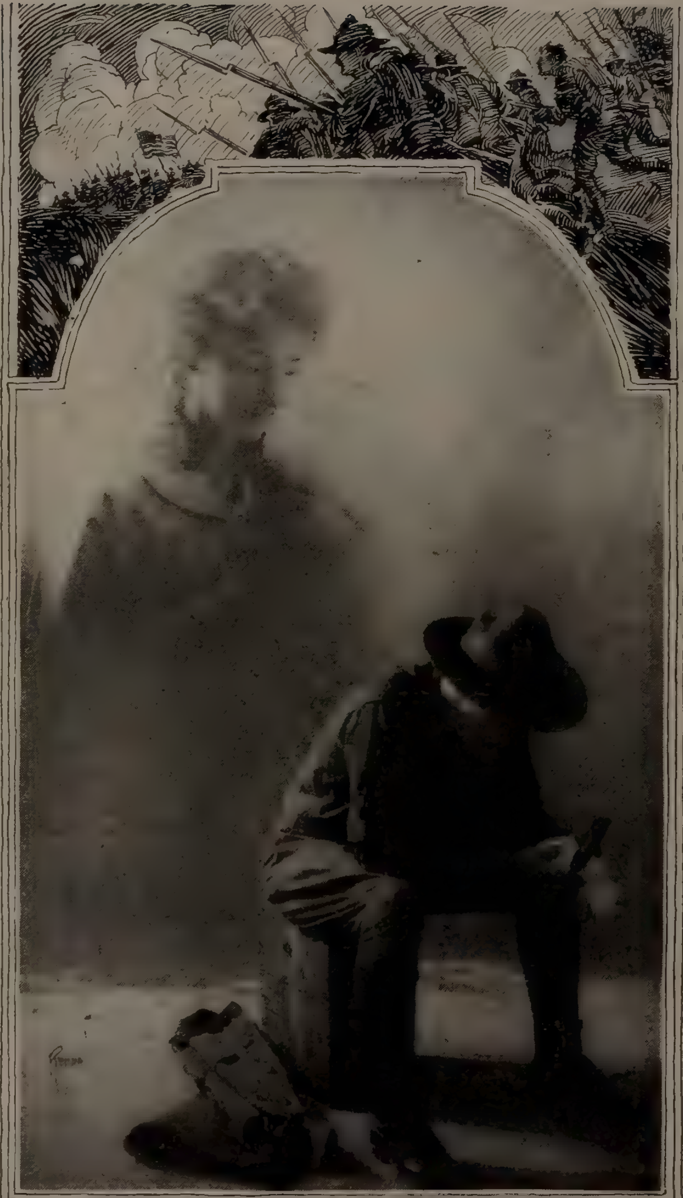
Mrs. Gilbert Colgate of New York City, an officer of the American Waldensian Aid Society, writes to the Christian Herald telling of the suffering in northern Italy, due to the war. Thousands of refugees from the invaded territory are seeking shelter and help in districts where the food supply is already terribly depleted. In a letter, just received by the same lady, there is a story of a sacramental service held under very trying conditions. The writer, a sub-Lieutenant in the Italian army, says:

"Yesterday we had a visit from our chaplain, David Bosio. He found a small number gathered to meet him, word having been sent to them. I cannot describe the happiness we felt in being thus met together, a happiness all the greater because we were to observe the sacrament of the Supper. This simple service took place in a hut buried in the snow at an altitude of 6,900 feet. The hut was lit by four candles; icicles hung from the roof and the floor was covered by a goodly layer of ice; on a small table in one corner was the Bible and the cup, and around it a bench and some rickety chairs. Every few minutes the storm that was howling outside drove a puff of snow in upon us; but we gave slight heed to the snow and the intense cold: absorbed in our devotional service, we rose above the things of this world; our thoughts were of God and of His Christ. When the service had closed, we returned to the command of——through a dark tunnel cut through the snow, where we gathered round the stove and spoke of our holy faith and of our dear ones. The memory of this service on one of the summits of Cadore, a few hundred yards from the enemy, amidst snow and ice, will remain graven for ever on our hearts."

In the territory between Venice and Milan there are some thirty Waldensian churches, all of which are afflicted by war conditions. Any reader of this paper desiring to help these good people in their time of affliction, can do so by sending his offering for the Waldensians to the Christian Herald, to be forwarded.

Mr. Benjamin F. Richards, a reader of this paper in West Haven, Conn., sends us a letter from his son who is doing ambulance service at the front in France, and who is anxious to make Christmas a season of cheer for the French wounded. The letter gives a vivid picture of the scene of his labors. He writes: "A white 'Salle' and above a single bed, two medals—a wan face, a broken man beneath—ah! it is poor recompense—that warm ribbon with its bronze pendant! The tents are neat, full and winter coming on, the dread season of untold suffering from pain that is not 'from steel.' Row upon row of stoic faces—but beneath the white coverlets, broken men—frosted feet, neglected wounds and scratches—and it is winter now. Picture the craving of these suffering brothers for a Christmas. Think, and then make others see as 'we' have seen, and give for the Christmas which may mean the bright star in the obscure night of suffering." Mrs. B. F. Richards, the young man's mother, resides in Connecticut, and any reader of this paper who wishes to help brighten Christmas for these poor wounded fellows "somewhere in France," can send his offering through the Christian Herald.

E. K., South Coventry, Conn. We cannot discuss the causes of the world-war at this time. The subject is now beyond the range of discussion.



A SOLDIER'S VISION

BY Margaret E. Sangster

There's a little girl I'm loving in the land across the sea;
Through the softness of the twilight she comes creeping close to me;
I can almost feel her handclasp, I can see her tender eyes,
As they glow across the darkness with a light that never dies.

Ah, a hard day lies behind me—there's a bitter dawn ahead;
There's a man next door who's moaning and my bunkie-mate lies dead;
But she's coming through the shadows, and her glance is misty bright,
And I know her love is near me through the horror of the night.

Yes—she gave me to our country, though she might have made me stay,
[How she kissed me smiling bravely, as she brushed the tears away!]
And her voice rings past the moaning, past the battle raging near,
And she says, "Be true and fearless, just because I love you, dear!"

There's a little girl, she's waiting in the land across the foam,
And I know that she is praying that with honor I'll come home;
And I make myself a promise that I'll justify her plan—
The ideal that she sets me of a soldier and a man!

E. D., Kansas. Please explain (1) John 17 : 19 and (2) Lev. 14 : 34-48.

1. One of the main purposes of Jesus' activities on earth was to bring his disciples and all his followers to a consecration like his own, and it is in this sense that he uses the word "sanctify." He speaks of sanctifying himself because he is thinking of his work as High Priest, which was immediately impending. As he was sanctifying himself for that supreme effort, so were the disciples to consecrate themselves freely and willingly, in personal faith, to the task set before them of also being living sacrifices, as which they are to go forth proclaiming the Father, to be preserved by him and to give to the world the example of a perfect consecration. Thus will the Father be glorified in them as he has been in the Son. 2. The leprosy in a house, referred to in Lev. 14 : 34, is not the leprosy that attacks the human body, but a mural efflorescence or species of mildew on the walls, apt to be produced in very damp situations and followed by effects injurious to health. It may be that it is analogous to dry rot which, in certain climates, on attacking the walls of a house, spreads with such rapidity that it may destroy the most substantial dwelling in a few years.

F. C., Greenup, Ill. You need both a body and a soul physician. Use the means at your disposal and ask God to bless them.

C. F., Indiana. We should strive, with all our might and with God's help, to conquer our besetting sins, and when we valiantly battle, we shall be rid of them. In the meantime, however, God will not deny us help along other lines, and we should pray for other things with like assurance.

Mrs. A. C., Mount Juliet, Tenn. The Gentiles that did not have the law certainly cannot and will not be judged by it, but as Paul points out (Rom. 2 : 14), they have and are a law unto themselves, according to which they will be judged by the doing and not by the hearing of it.

M. T. E., Tropic, Fla. The gravamen of the argument commenced by the apostle in Hebrews 8 and carried into the first part of Hebrews 10 is that not only is Christ greater than Aaron, but his functions and all else connected with him and them are superior to those of the priests. Jesus' ministrations are priestly and as Mediator, but under a new covenant, which is spiritual in its nature and is based on better promises. In contradistinction to the repeated offerings of the priests, Christ's sacrifice was only offered once, as a complete fulfilment of the divine will, followed by an exaltation never to be put away.

J. M., Chicago, Ill. Tradition, that perverter of facts, has identified the sinful woman, out of whom seven devils were cast, with Mary Magdalene, but there is no proof to that effect. Art and tradition, and the usage of modern language, have combined in fixing upon the woman of the ointment the stigma of unchastity. She was one of the most affectionate and favored of the Lord's disciples.

Miss J. B., Bernardson, Mass. 1. If we knew, which we do not, we could not, under present governmental restrictions, disclose the movements of troops or their departure from a given point. 2. It will take, under present conditions, about three weeks for a letter to be received here from France.

Worried. What is the right course for a penitent to take who has committed a sin so awful that there is no peace left in life? Will God hear the prayers of such a person for pardon and peace?

Yes, God promises to hear such prayers. He is gracious and merciful and will not turn away his face from you, if you will return to him (II Chron. 30 : 9). "I have no pleasure in the death of him that dieth, saith the Lord: wherefore turn yourselves, and live." (Ezek. 18 : 32.) "All his transgressions that he hath committed, they shall not be mentioned unto him." (Ezek. 18 : 22.) The Bible teems with promises to the backslider who repents and asks for pardon. The only condition is that the sin be put aside and not repeated. God pardons those who give up their sin, but not those who love it, cleave to it, and continue in it. The sincere penitent may not have peace immediately, but he has immediate pardon, and that is what he needs. Mark, who knew Peter well, tells us (Mark 14 : 72) that even at that late date, when Peter thought on his sin, he wept. He grieved still for what he had done, yet he had no doubt of having been forgiven. "Neither do I condemn thee," Christ said to one flagrant sinner (John 8 : 1-11); "go and sin no more."

M. S. T., Hookerstown, Pa. Moses appears to have fasted forty days and nights on three distinct occasions. They are recorded in Deut., 9 : 9, 10, 25. The first two are mentioned in Ex. 24 : 18 and 34 : 28. The third refers to the incident mentioned in Num. 14, but the fast and its duration are not given there, but in Deuteronomy only.

The Russian Peasant As I Know Him

By NEVIN O. WINTER

Author of "The Russian Empire of Today and Yesterday"

"POOR RUSSIA!" This is the expression that is heard on every side today. Torn by revolution, intoxicated with the idea of personal liberty, she is pulled this way and that way by the contending forces, the poor peasant scarcely knowing what he is doing or why he is doing it. The radicalism which is characteristic of the Russian Slav is now fully revealed, for circumstances have given a vent for its natural expression. When the dispatches told us that the red flag had been adopted as the official emblem of the revolutionists, and that all the exiles to Siberia had been released, we knew what that meant for Russia; for among them were exponents of the most radical ideas ever conceived—ideas whose adoption means not only the abolishment of all private property, but the abolition of all religion and all social regulations, including the institution of marriage itself.

Russia is fertile soil for the radical propagandist, for it is a land of ignorant peasants, and they overwhelmingly outnumber all others. It is the peasant who tills the soil, fills the factories, drinks the vodka, consumes the tea, fights his country's battles and blindly follows the revolutionary leaders. About eighty per cent. of the population belong to the peasant class, and about eighty-five per cent. of the population are unable to read and write.

ONE cannot understand Russia and the tremendously important events that are taking place there without understanding the peasant and his communistic environment. The peasants were serfs bound to the land by the laws up to 1861, when they were freed by the Czar Alexander II, just two years before the Emancipation Proclamation was issued in our own country. They are ignorant because they have never had the opportunity for education that is open to every American. The overwhelming majority of them are agriculturalists, for even those who have moved to the cities are still members of the village communes and have an interest in the land belonging to those primitive communities. It has only been in recent years that Petrograd, Moscow and Warsaw have reached the class of really large cities, but their population has been recruited almost wholly from the agricultural peasants.

There are many Americans who look upon the Russian as a bloodthirsty individual. On the contrary, the average Russian peasant is one of the mildest-mannered and best-natured human beings one can find. He is hospitable and kind-hearted, and would share his last kopeck with another poorer than himself. There are a great many good qualities that one can admire in Ivan, behind his bushy whiskers, while he and his communistic villages make an interesting study, the counterpart of which cannot be found elsewhere in Europe or America. Because of his ignorance and narrow viewpoint, he cannot understand the great world questions involved in the present struggle. He simply wants an opportunity to return home to his little Ivans and Elizabeths, and an opportunity to cultivate his communistic allotment of land.

THE moujik is the name applied to the Russian peasants. Far from being degraded and brutalized by the former slavery, he exhibits a great deal of self-respect. He is, above all, friendly and sociable. His mind moves rather slowly and in a simple circle; but it is full of kindly shrewdness and wit. The ordinary costume of the peasant varies, but all wear a long, home-made sheepskin coat, and often wear it throughout the hot summer as well as the extreme winter. The coat is generally very dirty and much patched, unless it happens to be a new one. In fact, the sense of cleanliness and neatness, as we understand it, seems entirely absent. He is so slow that the term "laziness" does not seem misapplied. He has the most marvelous capacity for wasting time without any reproach of his conscience.

Russian life has always been patriarchal, and the villagers live as one great family. This idea of the undivided ownership of land dates back almost a thousand years. Even when held as serfs, the peasants always claimed the land as their own. "We are yours," they said, "but the land is ours." When the peasants were freed, sections of land were given to each village. This is parceled out to the different families every few years by the village elders. If the land is of unequal fertility, each family is given an allotment of both the best and the poorest soil, in the effort to administer absolute impartiality. As a result, the land is frequently divided into very narrow strips. They may be as wide as fifty yards, but I have seen many not more than three yards wide.

"Land! More land!" This despairing cry arises from all over Russia. It is the real basic cause of the present revolution within a revolution. It is the promise of radical leaders to satisfy this craving, and to do it at once, that has attracted the peasants to their standard. Land is the primary consideration—the war and its visionary objects are secondary. This condition has made easy the work of German propaganda, for the peasant's mind is receptive to anything that promises more land. To be called a serf was not a disgrace for the peasant. The abstract idea of liberty did not mean so much. What he wants is land, and the man who promises this is the one the poor peasant will follow.

One of the unconventional ideas of the moujik, to the Western mind, is his idea of property in land. But when once understood, it is not so bad. In his mind there can be no such thing as ownership in virgin land. He holds that land, being an article of universal need, made by nobody, ought not to become property in the usual sense of the word. It should remain in the undisturbed possession of those by whom, for the time being, it is cultivated. Work alone gives a rightful claim to its possession. Even kinship affords no right to the property. Labor is always supreme. If there are several children, and one has worked at home longer than the other, he receives the lion's share. If the father should attempt to will it otherwise, the village commune would not hesitate to break the will if the aggrieved one should bring it to them for adjudication. The right to inheritance, as well as the right to enjoyment of land, in the peasant mind is founded on the doctrine of work alone.

Another peculiar working of this idea is in case of separation between husband and wife. According to peasant law, the wife should pay alimony to the husband, as a compensation for the loss of labor which her desertion entails. Women are treated in all respects on the same footing as men. They are judged on the basis of labor also, for this alone is recognized as giving an indefeasible right to property.

By the act of emancipation, the peasants received something like half of the land, to be held as the property of the various village societies. About 350,000,000 acres were thus set off for the peasants, an average of about seven acres for each freed serf. This averaged about thirty-three acres to each family, so it is estimated. For this land the villages had to pay a fixed price in small instalments to the nobles, which payments were spread over fifty years. This sum was advanced by the government, so that it became the creditor of the peasant communes. At various times, when the season has been poor, the imperial government remitted some of these payments and reduced taxes. The last payment was made about five years ago. Since the allotment, the population of the villages has greatly increased, almost doubled, but the holdings have remained the same. This is what has driven the young men and women to the cities.

THE family cannot be deprived of its home and agricultural implements, and the village cannot be deprived of its land by importunate creditors. The heads of the houses meet together in free council, and the basis is "One man, one vote." This council—called the "skhod"—has the general management of the whole village, or "mir." The matters with which they have to deal are those which most concern each individual member. It can divide the cultivation of the land among its members, admit new members, discipline its members, buy a fire-engine or modern agricultural machinery, and look after the relief of its own poor. An elder, called the "starosta," is elected, whose duty it is to call and preside over meetings.

ALTHOUGH the elder is entitled to wear a bronze medal, which is attached to a chain hung around his neck, it does not bring any special respect, and the small salary of a few rubles does not compensate for the trouble and annoyance. Hence the elections create little excitement, as all try to avoid the responsibility, and the holder of the office is often the least worthy member of the commune. The peasants plant their villages in the lee of some swell in the surface, or by the edge of a stream, in which they can water their flocks during the droughts which may come. The villages stretch down little valleys, seemingly for miles.

However dirty the house may be, there is generally a neat white lace curtain at each window and a row of flower-pots. The Russian housewife seems to feel the need of a little color in the midst of her dreamy surroundings. One can imagine what the atmosphere becomes, with the windows hermetically sealed for several months. The only fresh air introduced is when some one passes in or out of the door. Every bit of the hibernal air admitted must be heated, the peasant argues, and that means more fuel. The stable for the horses, cows, and other live stock adjoins the house, and they must be given a share of the heat as well.

MARRIAGE usually takes place at a comparatively early age among these peasants. Courtship occurs in the spring, and marriage follows in the fall. A man, a woman, and a horse make a household. The man can purchase the horse if he has the mercenary wherewithal, but obtaining a wife is a little different. Generally a matchmaker, who may be an aunt or other relative, is employed, who looks over the eligible young women of the village. When an eligible girl is found, her relatives are invited to come to the young man's house and see for themselves his family and home. Then, if they are satisfied, the groom-to-be's family are invited to return the call. The groom will pay a certain sum to buy the bride's trousseau, but her dowry may be only health and a pair of strong arms to do her share of the work. The weddings are comparatively simple, but the wedding-feast often lasts for two or three days, if money and eatables are in sufficient quantities. The newly married couple are showered with hops, instead of the rice of the Anglo-Saxon.

The Russia of the future will be a great country. For the present, it does not hold out much prospect at a time when a cohesive government is needed. While the United States and her western allies are centering power in the central government, Russia is disentegrating and becoming impotent. But the peasant will develop and come to his own at some time in the future.

Country Faces Coal Famine

DR. GARFIELD, Fuel Administrator, told two hundred chairmen of War Service Committees at Washington, on December 12, that only reduction in consumption would save the country from a coal famine. Dr. Garfield said that unless there was a concerted effort toward conservation the coal supply would not meet the requirements of industry. He said that first consideration would be given to the war industries, and that others might suffer, although no list of non-essential industries, to which coal was to be denied, would be made up.

On the same day the Gas and Electric Company of the City of Baltimore was obliged to discontinue furnishing electrical power for manufacturing purposes, closing down the works of the Baltimore Dry Dock and Shipbuilding Company engaged upon Government contracts and employing 3,500 men; and in Ohio, where an acute coal shortage had failed of relief for several days, Governor Cox went over the heads of the Fuel Administration officials and took the situation into his own hands, seizing all coal in transit within the State and ordering it made up into solid trainloads for those points in the State facing the most serious shortage. Later it was reported that Dr. Garfield had warned the Governor to keep hands off. Parts of New York City experienced an actual famine on December 10, 11, and 12.

News of the Week

NATION MAY CONTROL RAILROADS. The President, throughout the week ending December 15, had under active consideration the problems presented by the railroad situation. Conferences were held with the Railway War Board under which considerable unity of operation has been achieved, and with representatives of the Railway Brotherhoods whose co-operation will be necessary in the working out of any effective scheme. The Brotherhood heads, on December 13, told the President they would back any plan he adopted. It was announced on December 10 that the President had decided to urge Governmental control of the railroads of the country for the period of the war and would soon address Congress on the subject. The conferences that followed were concerned largely with the question as to how this control should be made effective. One of the problems arising in connection with Government operation is the problem of maintaining present values of railway securities, with which is entangled the equally important problem of wages to the operating force. It has been suggested that the Government guarantee to the roads a net income equal to the average for the last three years, while a board is suggested which shall canvass the wage situation every quarter.

HOOVER SAYS, "SAVE PORK." Herbert C. Hoover, Food Administrator, on December 13 appealed to the American people to increase their sacrifices in order to feed the Allies and friendly neutral countries. He asked that each household add to its wheatless and meatless days a porkless day, and to each day a wheatless and a meatless meal. Consumers were also urged to use sugar on a basis of not more than three pounds per person per month. We are urged, however, not to limit our supplies of milk or table butter.

UNITING THE FLEETS. It was officially announced on December 14 that, as a direct outgrowth of the Allied Naval Conference in Paris on November 29 and 30, an Allied Naval Council had been formed to "insure the closest touch and complete co-operation between the Allied fleets." France, England, the United States, Italy and Japan will be represented in the Council.

LLOYD GEORGE WITH WILSON. Premier David Lloyd George, in a speech on December 14, declared that the Allies were making steady progress toward the goal of victory, the only hope of peace, and that any peace overtures to Prussia at this time would be a betrayal of trust. He declared that the defection of Russia from the fighting was balanced by the preparation of America; and that while it would be folly to underrate the present danger, it would be equal folly to exaggerate it, and the greatest folly of all not to face it. He declared himself in agreement with President Wilson and warned the nation to watch the man who thinks there is a half-way house between victory and defeat.

SENATE INVESTIGATES SUGAR, COAL AND WAR. Among the first acts of the recently convened Senate was the passage of two resolutions, one authorizing the Military Affairs Committee, of which Senator Chamberlain of Oregon is chairman, to investigate the army organization and the situation at the various training camps with regard to the reported shortage of military equipment, the other authorizing a searching inquiry into the fuel and sugar situations. Senator Chamberlain's committee began its inquiry at once. General Crozier was the first witness on December 12. He told the committee that the delay was partly attributable to the Secretary of War and partly to failure, due to our Governmental system, to get the necessary appropriations from Congress at the start. He stated that for the present the ordnance for our army abroad was being furnished by Great Britain and France, but that by next summer the armies we are training would be fully equipped with American materials.

THE TOLL AT HALIFAX. The death roll of the Halifax explosion was officially fixed on December 12 at 1,266. The British government granted a million pounds for the relief of Halifax.

THE STATUS OF AUSTRIANS. President Wilson, on December 12, issued a proclamation declaring the state of war with Austria-Hungary. In this proclamation Austro-Hungarian subjects were not referred to as "aliens" but as "natives, citizens, denizens or subjects of Austria-Hungary." The principal restriction laid upon them was that they must not depart from or enter the United States without special permit, and only those whom there is a reasonable cause to believe are aiding or about to aid the enemy, or whose liberty may be a danger to the public peace, or who violate the necessary regulations or criminal law of the United States, are to be subject to arrest.

SUFFRAGE AND PROHIBITION. The Judiciary Committee of the House of Representatives, on December 11, reported favorably the proposed prohibitive amendment to the Federal Constitution, and reported without recommendation the proposed Woman Suffrage amendment.

PRUSSIAN BALLOT REFORM. On December 14 the debate in the Prussian Lower House on the Ballot Reform Bill was finished and the measure was referred to a committee of thirty-five members, which will report some time after the New Year.

FRAGMENTS OF NEWS. The Supreme Court on December 10 decided that the law of the State of Idaho prohibiting individual possession of intoxicating liquor without a permit was constitutional. The North Carolina law requiring railroads to keep a record of all liquor carried was also sustained. On the same day the court rendered decisions supporting the right of workmen to organize for lawful purposes and also upholding the right of employers to operate their plants as "open shops." . . . A great campaign under which the Government expects to raise two billions of dollars started on December 2, when the Thrift stamps and War Savings stamps were placed on sale in banks, post-offices, schoolrooms and department stores throughout the nation. The stamps mature January 1, 1923, and pay four per cent. interest at their maturity, but may be redeemed before maturity at the rate of three per cent. The lowest denomination is 25 cents. . . . The Senate on December 12 passed the Webb Export Bill permitting combinations of American exporters to promote foreign commerce.

The End of the Age and How to Meet It

By REV. JAMES M. GRAY, D.D., Dean of the Moody Bible Institute of Chicago

I

I TAKE the liberty of changing the theme of this last article of the supplemental series on Prophecy, in order to bring the whole to that spiritual and practical conclusion which has been in mind from the first.

It is a brief exposition of Paul's words to Timothy that I have chosen—those in the third and fourth chapters of the second letter to his young son in the faith, beginning with the words: "This know also that in the last days perilous (grievous) times shall come." By "the last days" I do not understand him to mean those preceding the end of the world—which, as we have seen, is doubtless a long way off—but those preceding the end of the age, which, for aught we know, may be very near.

Indeed, his description of those days so tallies with what we see around us now as almost to compel the conclusion that he has the present time in mind. For is not this time marked by selfishness, by the love of money, boasting, pride, blasphemy, disobedience to parents, unthankfulness, the absence of natural affection, the breaking of treaties, slander, incontinence, fierceness and the other awful things he names? Does not the love of pleasure supersede the love of God today, and has not formalism largely taken the place of real spiritual power in the religious life?

Of course it may be said that these things have been apparent in every period of the professing church, from apostolic days till now. Cowper thought they marked his period over 100 years ago, when he wrote:

> The prophets speak of such, and, noting down
> The features of the last degenerate times,
> Exhibit every lineament of these.

But this does not affect the prediction that they will mark the last days, nor the fact that they assuredly mark the present ones.

II

THEREFORE particular interest attaches to the three or four additional things which Paul says about these days:

1. He speaks of the influence of the formalists on the female mind. "Of this sort are they that creep into houses and lead captive silly women." Not that all women are silly, as some of Paul's critics might be quick to charge him as having said, but that those are silly who are led away by these false teachers, whose propaganda he informs us is marked by secretiveness, cowardice and ignorance. We think of Bahaism in these days, and the Star of the East, and New Thought, and Christian Science, and Spiritualism, and other forms of Theosophy and Buddhism which get their foothold in these Western climes generally through woman's susceptibility. When her conscience is restless because of sin and fear, and failing to accept Jesus Christ as her Saviour and Lord, she "casts wearily about for other anodynes," the false teacher gets his opportunity. He has his occult solutions of her difficulties, and she listens and experiments and becomes infatuated and is lost.

2. A second thing he mentions is that these "evil men and seducers" (or impostors)—for thus he characterizes false teachers of religion—"shall wax worse and worse, deceiving and being deceived," a prediction definitely answering the ever-recurring question as to whether the world is growing better or worse. The modern view is that improvement is constantly in progress and that even this world-war is to eventuate in better things; but the Bible steadfastly teaches the opposite. And it does so because it is dealing with fundamental and eternal principles, rather than material phenomena of any kind. These latter can be good and lasting only as they express or are based upon the right view of and the right relationship to God, which are clearly inconsistent with the growth of religious imposture in the world. Note further, that these impostors are not only deceiving others, but are themselves deceived. The god of this age, as Satan is called in the Bible, is he who controls their thinking and inspires their religious zeal, though they are unaware of it. Because they refuse the love of the truth, God gives them over to a delusion that they should believe the lie (II Thess. 2 : 10, 11).

3. A third thing is the certainty of persecution for all who oppose the world's view of things, or, as the apostle puts it, "for all that will live godly in Christ Jesus." "Antithetical principles must collide, and collision for the Christian disciple must bring pain." This may not mean, in these days, the fagot, or imprisonment, or the lictor's thong, though in some places and under some conditions these are not impossible; but it will mean ostracism and contempt, it will mean defection of relatives and friends, and it will mean an opposition on the part of those who have the power of worldly preferment, that will bring deprivation and loss that can be felt.

4. But a fourth thing Paul mentions has joy and comfort in it. These false teachers shall come to an end, or, as his words in II Tim. 3 : 9 might be rendered, "they shall not proceed too far." The hounds of hell are leashed. He compares the teachers with the magicians who withstood Moses before Pharaoh, and he affirms that their folly shall be made evident to all men, as was true in the other case. But that will be the day of the manifestation of the sons of God, the day of the Lord's coming.

III

WE have thus before us a picture of the last days, however sketchy, and it is in order now to follow Paul, as by inspiration of the Holy Spirit, he instructs and warns us how to face the situation it discloses and how to solve its problems. Three lines of action are set forth:

1. After describing the character of the men and women who are in part the cause and in part the product of the times, and after climaxing his description of the religionists who hold only the outward form of godliness and deny the power thereof, he says: "From such turn away" (II Tim. 3:5). There must be no compromise, in other words, and no parley. Separation must be the rule.

Devoutly is it to be wished that the youth of our generation would act on this advice, or rather command, and "turn away" from these false systems of religion before attempting to investigate them. To investigate them is worse than useless, for there is always peril in it. And this investigation has been done for us by those competent for the task, and who have stamped on such false systems their character in no mistakable terms. The fabric of these false systems is not new, though like an old dress they sometimes deceive us by taking on new collars and cuffs. Their beginnings were in Babylon on the plain of Shinar, of which we have written in a preceding article, and which the Bible calls "the mother of the harlots and the abominations of the earth" (Rev. 17:5). From her face flight is the only safety.

2. But flight is nothing if there be no refuge to fly to, and therefore Paul reveals one in the Word of God. "Continue thou in the things which thou hast learned and hast been assured of," he says to Timothy, "knowing of whom thou hast learned them" (3:14). The things he had learned and had been assured of were those of Holy Scripture. Therefore he is exhorted to continue, or abide, in his early faith.

Bishop Moule's commentary reminds us of the vividness of that word, "continue." Timothy is not merely to hold these things as opinions; they are not to be merely a thin thread of sentiment in his mental make-up, "a languid conservation of what has become habitual," but to be grasped as a living force. He is to stay in the things he has believed, to find his home there and to be always at home. The truths concerning God, Christ, sin, redemption, faith, holiness, and the return of our Lord are to be his inner circle, his atmosphere, nearer than anything else to him. He is to be fused with them so that they and he shall be one reality.

But why that reference to salvation in the verse? "From a child thou hast known the holy Scriptures, which are able to make thee wise unto salvation through faith which is in Christ Jesus."

Was not Timothy already saved? Assuredly, so far as deliverance from condemnation was concerned. But salvation is not only a thing of the past but something also which is going on. Timothy needed what every true Christian needs, a salvation from the spirit and the power of the times in which he lives. A daily salvation from the love of self, the love of money, pride, boastfulness, blasphemy, ingratitude, slander, incontinence, fierceness, treason, the inordinate love of pleasure, and, fundamentally, from that unspiritual Christianity which is the form of godliness without its power. He needs a salvation which enables him to overcome the world every day, and that salvation becomes his instrumentally through the Word of God.

That Paul means something like this is clear from the next verse, where he says: "All Scripture is given by inspiration of God, and is profitable for doctrine (teaching), for reproof, for correction, for instruction in righteousness, that the man of God may be complete, furnished completely unto every good work" (R. V.).

These are the times, therefore, to get back to the Bible by many so long neglected. Today we need right teaching, we need the reproof of authority, we need the correction that springs from wisdom and love, and we need that instruction in righteousness which rounds out the Christian profession in the kind of service that honors God.

3. But to "continue" in the faith is not enough save as an effort is made to reach others who are not of the faith. And so, in the succeeding chapter, Paul says: "I charge thee therefore before God and the Lord Jesus Christ, who shall judge the quick and the dead at his appearing and his kingdom: preach the Word; be instant in season, out of season; reprove, rebuke, exhort, with all long-suffering and doctrine."

This is the paramount duty of the Christian in these days: not to disseminate his opinions about religion or the times, but to preach the Word. "In season, out of season," characterizes it as a fireside task; the task of the social circle; the task of the store and the shop, the camp and the market-place. Women, meeting together in Red Cross work, company the clinking of your scissors and your knitting needles with the preaching of the Word! "Do your bit" to create an atmosphere for God, a chance for his voice to be heard in the midst of the world's Babel. To do this you will need the grace of "long-suffering" of which Paul speaks, for surely these are the times when "they will not endure the sound doctrine; but having itching ears, shall heap unto themselves teachers after their own lusts."

IV

THERE is strong encouragement to act on Paul's instruction and advice. He is himself ready to be offered, and the time of his departure is at hand. He has fought the good fight, he has finished the course, he has kept the faith. He has done that which he is urging Timothy, and you and me, to do. And now he says,

> Henceforth there is laid up for me the crown of righteousness, which the Lord, the righteous judge, shall give me at that day, and not to me only, but unto all them also that love his appearing.

God help each one of us to make full proof of our ministry, for the Judge standeth at the door.

Jerusalem's Holy Places Saved

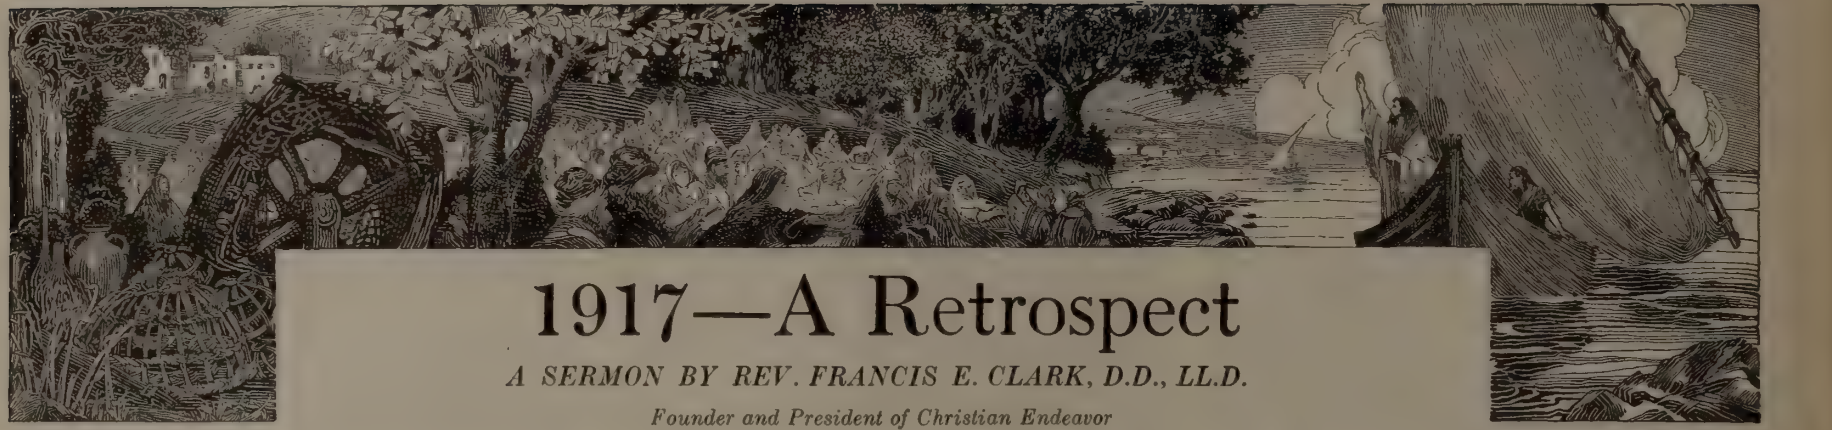
THE surrender of Jerusalem by the Turks to the British forces under General Allenby, which was briefly announced in last week's issue of the Christian Herald, was accomplished without a battle. General Allenby reported that on Saturday, December 8, they attacked the enemy's positions south and west of Jerusalem. His troops advanced from the direction of Bethlehem, drove back the Turks and passed Jerusalem on the east, establishing themselves on the Jerusalem-Jericho road. Another British force simultaneously attacked the strong Turkish positions west and northwest of Jerusalem and secured control of the Shechem-Jerusalem road. The ancient city, being thus completely surrounded and isolated, was surrendered without further resistance.

It was arranged that General Allenby and his staff, accompanied by the commanders of the French and Italian contingents and the heads of the French political mission, should enter Jerusalem on December 11, a small British party having already gone ahead on a safe-guarding mission, for the purpose of arranging for the protection of the holy places. It is explained that the delay in taking the final steps was largely caused by solicitude for the safety of these sacred places, not only in the city itself but in the surrounding country near by, and that by this means no appreciable harm has resulted.

Jewish leaders and the Jewish people generally, both in Europe and America, are greatly stirred over the news of the Turkish retirement from Jerusalem. In an interview in London, Israel Zangwill, the well-known Jewish leader, expressed himself as now hopeful of the dream of a Jewish republic coming true. He regarded a separate and independent state as the great Jewish hope for the future of Palestine. "I would call it the Republic of Judea or Israel," he said. "It would be an autonomous, separate nation under the protection of the great world powers, temporarily at least. Of course, no one expects or believes that all Jews would go to Palestine to live under the new conditions; but Jewish capital would be employed, and the new nation would become the home of the oppressed of other nations. Jews throughout the world would feel that they had a national home once more. Thirteen million Jews are looking today toward Jerusalem to see the Holy City restored. What could be more fitting than a Jewish nation—reborn after centuries of Jewish travail?"

ZIONISTS are greatly encouraged over the prospect of a "National Homeland" for the Jews in Palestine, and should the fortunes of war continue favorable, they look forward to the rehabilitation of Palestine and to its repopulation as a possibility of the near future.

The British government, less than two months ago, announced itself as favorable to the "national homeland" project. Further, on November 9, Arthur J. Balfour, the British Foreign Secretary, wrote to Lord Rothschild: "The government view with favor the establishment of Palestine as a national home for the Jewish people, and will use their best endeavors to facilitate the achievement of this object, it being clearly understood that nothing will be done that may prejudice the civil or religious rights of existing non-Jewish communities in Palestine."



1917—A Retrospect

A SERMON BY REV. FRANCIS E. CLARK, D.D., LL.D.

Founder and President of Christian Endeavor

TEXT—Ps. 90 : 12. R. V. "So teach us to number our days that we may get us a heart of wisdom."

NEVER in the history of the world has a year passed that demands of every Christian such a heart-searching review as the year that is now almost ended.

The psalmist very likely had the future days in mind, the remaining years of his life, praying that since they might be few, he might make the most of them and thus "get him a heart of wisdom." But his words are no less appropriate to the past. If we but number the days that are gone, consider them well, learn their lessons and profit by their experience, untold blessings may come to us as individuals and nations.

The days of the year 1917! In one aspect, what dreadful days they have been! They have seen a world-war enter upon its fourth year. They have seen our own country, after nearly three years of hesitation, throw down the gage of battle, draft half a million soldiers, enroll as many more volunteers, and send an army to France. It has seen battles on many fronts rage with unremitting fierceness, the ingenuity of man in every nation turned toward killing his fellow man; new and bigger submarines, new and bigger war-flying machines, new and more destructive cannon and mines, new and more deadly gases. We have seen ships filled with innocent neutrals sunk; cities bombed where women and children chiefly suffered; cathedrals, the pride of centuries, destroyed; and fields and gardens that had for generations blossomed like the rose made a howling wilderness.

Worse than all, we have seen men literally by the hundred thousand killed on the field of battle, and others, literally by the million, wounded. Their gaping wounds cry out for pity.

A bad, bad year in the world's history, we say to ourselves.

And yet is there no relief, no lightening of the gloom, no silver edge to the dark cloud? Surely there must be, unless we believe that God has forsaken the world and altogether left it to its own wicked ways.

IN the first place, woeful as the times are, let us not exaggerate our woes. Every unfortunate individual is inclined to think that he, of all men, is most miserable. So the people of every age are ready to suppose that no other age ever saw such calamities and disasters.

"O the times! O the morals of the times!" sighed the old Roman. It has been the refrain of many an age since. We feel that we have peculiar reason to utter this wail. The Thirty Year's War, the uprising of the peasants in Luther's time, the French Revolution and many other wars have been of the same hideous nature as the present war, though on a smaller scale.

Yet the world survived; civilization was not permanently destroyed; goodwill, kindliness and generosity did not disappear even from the countries chiefly devastated. Christianity survived, and the Church of God outlived the horrors of those dreadful wars. Indeed, we can see that in some ways the world was purified by the fires through which it passed, and we may take heart of hope to believe that future generations may look back to this year which is passing, and say, "Dark as were those days, God had not forsaken the world in 1917. He was working out his mysterious plans. In the blood of the brave he was washing out some stains which could be expiated in no other way."

Few men, when they are ill, discouraged and disappointed, can see that things will ever be better. So it is apt to be with sick nations and generations of men. Their own evils loom large. They see only the dark clouds above them, and forget that the sun is shining behind the clouds.

It behooves every Christian to take a fresh hold of God, to anchor his faith deeper in the eternal promises, and to see, beyond present disasters, the possible purposes of God. War makes tyrants, but it does not make God a tyrant. War seems to change some men into fiends, but it does not make God any less the loving Father of us all.

NAY, is it not possible that when our children's children look back to 1917 they may say that was the year of the beginning of the great regeneration; the year of the beginning of reforms hastened by the war that set not back civilization a hundred years, as some predicted at the time, but that set it forward a full century on the shining path of progress? Some believe that these signs and portents mark the second coming of our Lord. That, surely, to the Christian, is no unwelcome event.

What gains to humanity may we conceive as possible, as we number these days of carnage? First, it is certainly not impossible that an age-long peace will come as the result of this war. Militarists I know will scoff at the possibility of a century of peace. Fighting is in the blood of mankind, they say; and blood will tell its old, old tale of conflict. One authority on war tries to console us by saying that a decisive victory for the Allies will bring sixty years of peace. A generation or so will live, exhausted and spent, preparing for another war which their children and children's children must wage! Horrible prospect! Let us hope he takes counsel of his profession and not of real conditions.

Never, I believe, has such a hatred of war been generated as by this war. Never was the world so war-weary as today. Other wars have been more or less localized. This has involved all the continents. We Americans did not learn to hate war when in 1870 the Prussians swept up to the gates of Paris, or when, a few years since, the British and Boers met in deadly clash. We were too far removed from these conflicts. Our Civil War did not fill Europe with horror, for it was three thousand miles away; but for us it made another Civil War impossible.

But the present war strikes at practically every home in the world. None are exempt from trouble. If it is not the loss of dear ones that we mourn, as millions do, yet gaunt starvation, or destitution, or loss of some kind stares every one in the face. Never before did the meaning of war come home to the heart of all the world. Never did the blessings of a just and righteous peace seem so priceless.

IF Christian people do their duty when this war is over, I believe that the next great war will be postponed not sixty years, nor ten times sixty, if the world lasts so long, but until the dawn of the Millennium.

Again, it is a commonplace to say that war brings out some of the best as well as the very worst traits of human nature. No one can think of Stonewall Jackson and Robert E. Lee, of Ulysses S. Grant and of O. O. Howard, the eminent Christian, of Havelock and Chinese Gordon and Captain Gardner, the devoted missionary, without acknowledging that in the midst of war a man may develop magnanimity and gentleness, as well as heroism and devotion to duty.

In reviewing the year we may well thank God that, against the black background of bloodshed and lust, cupidity, avarice and rapine, we may set the qualities of strenuous loyalty, purity and devotion to high principles, and to the simple call of duty, which has led millions of men to dare and to die.

I am thinking not only of the boys in the trenches and at the battle-front; not only of the wounded in the hospitals and the slain on the field of carnage; but of the ten times ten million silent, unheralded heroes who have borne their share of privation without a murmur—the mothers who have bade their sons good-by and never told their grief, lest others grieve the more; of those who have worked hard and lost money, perhaps, in raising the products of the soil, not that they might eat, but that others might live; of those who have denied themselves the comforts of life that an unknown soldier-boy or a starving Belgian or Pole or Armenian might have them.

In the New Year

IN the New Year, as in the past, the Christian Herald will be found in the forefront of every worthy cause, fighting the battles of the Christ and of redeemed and suffering humanity, striving always to keep before it the flaming light of truth.

Next week's issue begins the year, and begins it well, with a wonderful New Year's sermon by Dr. J. H. Jowett, "A Soldier of Christ."

In some respects organized Christianity has failed; in some it has succeeded grandly. Next week's Herald will begin a symposium, by leaders of different denominations, on the question as to what the Church must do to heal its wounds and to insure its full acceptance as the representative of the Risen Christ.

Next week, too, Frank Carpenter tells how the motor is revolutionizing farming and war.

Jerusalem, the goal of the Crusades, is no longer the captive of the Turk. Next week, "Jerusalem and the Jewish Hope."

I often think of those who go down to the sea in ships in these days of submarines and mines—the common sailors, uncommon in heroism, the engineers and stokers in the fire-hole where death is almost certain if the ship is sunk. There is no splendid reward for such men; no carved marble, no cross of honor, no recognition or acclamation, whether they live or die. Yet ships have been manned and have sailed the seas during all these years, as though no peril in "the waters under the earth" awaited the mariner.

FEW in any land have escaped unscathed in this year of war, and, with still fewer exceptions, the dangers and privations have been borne with uncomplaining fortitude. For this proof that man made in the image of God has not, even in war, altogether lost his Father's likeness, we should be profoundly grateful.

Once more, the remarkable advance along some lines of moral rectitude should cause us to thank God as we review this year. In no century, nay, in no millennium since the world began, has the temperance cause made such triumphant progress as during the years of the war, and especially during the last year. We have only to point to Russia, to the sweeping no-license votes in our own country, to the more halting progress of the cause in Great Britain and France, to prove this.

It is also true that in no war have such pains been taken to keep pure the camps of our soldier boys as now. Vice is at least kept at arm's length in most places, and General Pershing's claim that "if I win no other victory, I hope to win for my men a moral victory," is no empty boast.

We do not all admire ex-President Roosevelt's militarism, but we can all subscribe to the humane creed he wrote for the soldiers' Testaments: "Fight valiantly against the armies of Germany and Turkey, . . . love mercy, treat prisoners well, succor the wounded, treat every woman as though she were your sister, care for the little children, and be tender with the old and helpless."

Out of the murky horror of the war, too, have come some shining examples that show that the angels' song of goodwill to men is not forgotten on earth or in heaven. Edith Cavell's dying wish to harbor no resentment toward those about to slay her; Ensign Casalis, the young French Student Missionary Volunteer and the son of missionaries, killed on the Marne, with the dying prayer on his lips that he might rid his heart of all hate and rancor even while he fought, give us hope for the future of our race, when we remember that these thoughts and prayers have doubtless found an echo in millions of other brave hearts.

BUT we must number these 365 days of the dying year, not merely for the sake of recording their good and their ill, but that we may apply our hearts unto wisdom, or that we may get us a heart of wisdom, as the Revised Version phrases it. And what is the highest wisdom in these direful days? What else but to keep our faith undimmed, our hope unshaken, our trust in God's overruling Providence steadfast. These are indeed the times that try men's souls. May we all stand the test!

There is one Psalm which seems to have been written for this year, whose last hour has almost come. Let us take its triumphant melody into our heart of hearts. May it be our comfort for the present, our hope for the future:

God is our refuge and strength, a very present help in trouble.
Therefore will we not fear though the earth do change. . . .
The nations raged; the kingdoms were moved;
He uttered his voice; the earth melted.
Jehovah of hosts is with us.
The God of Jacob is our refuge.
Come, behold the works of Jehovah.
What desolations he hath made in the earth
He maketh wars to cease unto the end of the earth;
He breaketh the bow and cutteth the spear in sunder;
He burneth the chariot in the fire.
Be still and know that I am God.
I will be exalted among the nations, I will be exalted in the earth.
Jehovah of hosts is with us.
The God of Jacob is our refuge.

The Goings Out and the Comings In

SUNDAY, December 30. Ps. 121. "He shall preserve thy going out and thy coming in." The "going out" suggests the action of the early morning, when our strength has been renewed, and our purpose is refreshed, and enthusiasm has all the passion of an unspent fire. And the "coming in" suggests the close of the day, when the strength is exhausted, and the vision is dulled, and the enthusiasm has lost its ardor, and the soul crawls home in disappointment. And God's blessing is to be on morning and evening, and both seasons are to lie beneath his hallowing love and grace. The "going out" may be the splendid venture of a young knight, newly baptized into the order of chivalry—keen, eager, glowing with holy passion, and riding abroad to redress human wrongs. And the "coming in" may be the return of that same knight, wounded sore in the conflict, with his antagonists the apparent conquerors, and the clamant wrongs still crying for redress. And God's holy love is to be on the morning and the evening, and the knight is to be in the radiant circle of grace along the entire road.

All of which means that God's blessing does not desert us upon the threshold and send us forth alone to our alluring or repellent tasks. Our Lord is with us at the beginning and at the ending, and also between the beginning and the ending, even all along the road. "Having loved his own he loved them unto the end."

"Ye That Are Men"

MONDAY, December 31. I John 2 : 14. "I have written unto you, young men, because ye are strong, and the word of God abideth in you, and ye have overcome the wicked one." It is the testimony of army commanders in the present war that if they want men to lead a desperate charge, their embarrassment is that there are so many who are willing to go. Little jobs, petty errands, the soldiers are likely to evade and avoid; but they are always ready to lead a forlorn hope, to charge the enemy trenches, to destroy nests of machine guns, to venture out into No Man's Land and rescue the wounded. Virtually they say, "Give us something great to do, some impossible task to perform."

If we could visualize the obstacles in the way of the kingdom of God, if the Christian Church were fighting a battle against flesh and blood, how swiftly would heroic men and women rally round its banners! The enemies of Christianity, however, are generally invisible. But the need of heroism in the Christian life is ever present. To conquer pride, envy, avarice, malice, vain ambitions, corrupt affections, debased ideals—does not this call for strength? A young man, recently graduated from a great university, came to Jacob Riis at a critical time in his struggle for the cleansing of New York slums, and said, "I have read your book and I have come to help you." If we have strength to offer in the battle for a Christian city, a Christian state and a Christian world; if we are eager for responsibility, willing to become burden-bearers in the ranks of those who call themselves soldiers of Jesus Christ; if we are willing to add our strength to the strength of Christ's body, which is the church, this is the time for us to enlist. There is "beautiful fighting all along the line." A pure, strong church is the world's best bulwark against the embattled hosts of selfishness and sin.

His Glorious Name

TUESDAY, January 1. Ps. 72 : 19. "Blessed be his glorious name for ever: and let the whole earth be filled with his glory; Amen, and Amen." On the eighth day after his birth our Lord received his name: obeying the angel's direction, his parents named him Jesus. According to our modern chronology the anniversary of the event would coincide with the beginning of a new year. What a happy coincidence! Jesus means Saviour, Rescuer, Helper. It embodies his entire life-work. It declares his whole mission. It attaches him to every human need. It speaks courage to the faint-hearted, cheer to the despondent, strength to the feeble. It is just the name to write on the banner of faith that is to be borne aloft before us as we cross the line that marks the beginning of a new year.

David in this Psalm undoubtedly speaks not only of the kingdom of his son Solomon but of the kingdom of him who is greater than Solomon. For he says that his name shall endure for ever, and all men shall be blessed in him. "He shall come down like rain upon the mown grass": now that the grim reaper has been abroad for more than three years we yearn for the time when Jesus' grace shall again descend upon the fields of death and desolation and his love shall turn into gardens the wilderness which men's hatred has made. "He shall redeem the souls of the needy from deceit and violence, and precious shall their blood be in his sight": it is a great comfort to us to think that the righteous and merciful Jesus is in the midst of the terrors of these days, and will bring great good out of the present tribulations. We lift our hearts and hands to him, "who only doeth wondrous things." With the world's sorrows and sufferings we commit to him our own fears and hopes. We trust him to prove himself Jesus to every aching heart in the five continents and in the seven seas. Amen, and Amen.

The Light of the World

WEDNESDAY, January 2. John 8 : 12. "I am the light of the world." Holman Hunt's "Light of the World" is a masterpiece of color, expression, originality and dreamlike mystery. Christ is gorgeously arrayed like a king with a crown and robes. He is knocking, at midnight, at the door of a humble hut which weeds and grasses have almost hidden from the sight. The lantern which the Master carries is meant to typify the glory of the light one possesses who follows him.

Every one who gazes upon this matchless production knows that Christ is thus standing before the door of his own soul and that he has either shut the door in his face or gladly opened it for his entrance.

The question comes to every one, "What will you do with your Visitor who stands robed in spotless white, like a priest, knocking, that he may come in and minister as a Mediator and Saviour?" Perhaps you say, "My house is so full of unholy things, it is no place for the Prince of Life." Or, you are too busy with your accumulations to give a moment of time to him who gave his life for you. The light he carries flashes upon your conscience like flames of remorse. You say, "I wish he would go away for this time; when I am better ready, I will call for him."

Ah, I can see his face through a broken panel of the door—it is full of loving tenderness, with marks of suffering where a crown of thorns has pressed, and now has put forth leaves for the healing of the nations. His head is wet with the dewy tears of midnight.

He has waited long, is waiting still;
You treat no other friend so ill.

Will he knock till stars grow old? Till death breaks in the door? Oh that I could get consent of my will to let the patient Pilgrim in! Do I not hear the voice of the Saviour himself, whispering to me, "Behold, I stand at the door and knock; if any man hear my voice and open the door, I will come in to him, and will sup with him and he with me."

Walls of Salvation

THURSDAY, January 3. Isa. 60 : 18. "Thou shalt call thy walls Salvation." What does the term salvation mean, in the sense in which Isaiah uses it, in the sense in which the New Testament uses it? Here is described a royal highway whereon the saved alone shall walk. Here is the promise of an undefiled and fadeless inheritance, which only the saved can claim. The saved alone shall have a place and part with those who wear their snow-white robes and sing victorious songs and enter in through gates of pearl into the city of God. Is it a small thing then to be saved? Can we be saved by subscribing to a creed, by signing a constitution, by submitting to an initiatory rite, or by producing a certificate of good moral character? Surely salvation is a greater thing than this, touching as it does the very springs of character, the intellect, the heart, the will, the sum of all thought and feeling and action. It includes every avenue and apartment of life. It is not without significance that the Revised Version of the New Testament in almost every case substitutes the word "life" for the word "soul." Critical scholarship perceived the importance of making plain that salvation concerns not the soul alone but the whole life. The purpose of the Son of Man, when he came to seek and save the lost, included lost bodies and lost minds, lost homes and lost states, a lost society and a lost race. The ultimate purpose of the Gospel is to secure a saved world—art saved from vulgarity, wealth saved from selfishness, poverty saved from despair, industry saved from oppression, and commerce from greed.

Immanuel

FRIDAY, January 4. Isa. 7 : 14. "She shall call his name Immanuel." The mystery of the incarnation of the Son of God baffles our efforts at comprehension, but believingly accepting it as a fact we realize that the very name which sets forth the mystery is a source of perennial comfort. God with us; that means that Jesus entered our lowly life and passed through its various stages to assure us that he has not only a divine, omniscient knowledge of what man's life here on earth is, but he has also a very human knowledge, gained by personal experience, of what this life means to every one of us. Our prayers addressed to him meet with most intelligent sympathy. "We have not an high priest which cannot be touched with the feeling of our infirmities; but was in all points tempted like as we are, yet without sin" (Heb. 4 : 15).

God with us; that is a strong encouragement to our faith when we are facing difficult tasks and grievous duties. He is by our side, and will solve our dilemmas. God with us! What an invincible alliance can we boast upon this blessed fact against the most formidable odds that may confront us! The gates of hell shall not prevail against us. God with us! What a call to serious reflection is issued to us in this name of our Lord! Let every word and action of ours be such that it can find his righteous endorsement and breathe his loving spirit. God with us! This name gives strong wings to our immortal hope. Some day we shall be with him whom our soul loveth. We shall ascend where he is, and ever be with him, sharing his everlasting joy and glory.

Immanuel, thou who hast bought us with thy blood, who hast pardoned our iniquities, we hail thee now by faith as our great Friend and Brother. Oh, bring us where in rapturous vision our satisfied hearts shall embrace thee with perfect love as the treasure above all treasures!

Self-Sacrifice of Christ

SATURDAY, January 5. John 18 : 8. "If, therefore, ye seek me, let these go their way." When the mob was seeking to arrest Jesus, turning to his alarmed disciples he said to his persecutors, "If you are seeking Jesus of Nazareth, I am he; let these go their way." Christ, who is seeking the salvation of mankind, in his own hour of greatest peril thinks first of the safety of his little group of followers, as though he says, "I am ready for you to arrest me, but you must spare my disciples."

As soon as Jesus said, "I am he," they went backward and fell to the ground. Thus our Lord gave his disciples time to escape while the mob was helpless on their backs.

Calvary was only the climax of the self-sacrifice of Christ. His whole life manifested this spirit. He washed the feet of the disciples for an example of humility. He fed the multitude who followed him only for the loaves and fishes. He worked miracles for people who had no other interest in him than to receive benefits. His whole life was for the sake of the happiness of others. On him was laid the iniquity of us all.

Christ speaks to the eternal law of God, saying, "Strike me, but let these go free. Bruise me, but do not harm them. I am here to lay down my life for men, here to be scourged, wounded and crucified. I can be satisfied only in the salvation of my lost children." This spirit of loving kindness and forgiveness, as old as eternity, can only carry us through eternity.

Would you not delight in such sheltering care as the Master gave to his disciples when he stood between them and his enemies from the Sanhedrin, supported by Roman soldiers? Does he care for you with the power of divine protection? Is he with you always in the journey of life, leading you in the way that is everlasting?

A Timely Investigation

THE Senate Military Affairs Committee has made a wise move in inquiring into the organizing, training and equipping of the National Army before growing rumors could develop into a scandal. The investigation has a double purpose to serve—the uncovering and correction of any real wrong and the prompt disposal of all baseless charges and innuendoes.

There need be no surprise at disclosures of shortcomings, defects and imperfections. It would have been impossible to have created in such short time the vast and intricate war organization without errors. If the inquiry shall result in the correction of errors, it will have done good; if it shall check unwarranted criticism and strengthen confidence, it will have done good again. The friendly nature of the inquiry seems to forbid any sensational exposures.

The inquiry into the operation of the Food and Fuel Commissions by the Senate Manufactures Committee is of a somewhat different spirit. The chairman of this committee, Senator Reed of Missouri, opposed the creation of the Food Commission, and has been quoted as saying recently that it has done more harm than good. Though most members of the committee are friendly to the commissions being investigated, it is reasonably certain that Chairman Reed will permit no faults to escape notice.

All this is as it should be, for wrongs, if they exist, and hurtful criticisms, if they are unfounded, cannot be stopped too soon. Not only may the lives of the thousands of our boys going to the front be unnecessarily imperiled by mismanagement, but the sufferings of the millions at home for want of necessaries of life may be unbearably increased by unfair distribution of the nation's food and fuel.

Searching inquiry, if there are no wrongs, can do no harm; if there are wrongs, it can do great good.

Help Halifax

IN these days of universal suffering, the Halifax calamity makes special appeal to the generosity of Americans. Its citizens are our neighbors and our allies, and have every claim upon our practical sympathy. Even before any call for help came, our relief trains with food and physicians and nurses were speeding toward the stricken city, where a blizzard was intensifying the disaster.

It is a sad Christmas season for our Dominion friends, with a large part of one of their principal cities in ruins, thousands dead and injured, and more than 25,000 homeless and destitute in midwinter. America's great heart is deeply touched by such suffering at our doors, and our pity should take the best and most practical form. Let all unite to help Halifax. The Christian Herald War Relief Fund, immediately after the announcement of the disaster, cabled $5,000 for urgent relief. We want our readers to have a large share in this helpful work, which lies so near to our hand, and we will welcome and forward all contributions they may send us. Help Halifax by sending in your gift today.

Cross and Crescent

JERUSALEM is delivered. Its Moslem masters have surrendered to the Christian conqueror. No longer will the Crescent, which has floated above it for nearly seven centuries continuously, be seen upon its walls and towers and gateways. In this greatest of wars, the capitulation of David's ancient capital must be regarded as an event of importance in a military sense; but to the entire Christian world it possesses a far wider and higher significance. It means that the East is slipping away from the power of the Caliphate. Egypt cut off its fetters long ago. Now the Arabian kingdom, with the shrines of Mecca and Medina, is dissevered. In Syria, to the farthest borders of Mesopotamia, the ancient supremacy of the Sultan is broken, and unless the fortunes of war should bring about a new situation, the old dream of Moslem supremacy is shattered forever.

Jerusalem, with its holy places, was one of the few remaining pillars of the infidel power which has afflicted the world and filled the pages of history with deeds of horror. But while its surrender, virtually without a struggle, marks an ominous day for Mohammedanism, it is a day that is luminous and full of splendid possibilities for both the Jew and the Christian. To those who have been watching the struggle in the East with regard to its relations to prophecy, the event possesses an interest which nothing in any other theater of the war can equal. Among all religionists, David's ancient capital is identified with sacred memories. It has been the birthplace of the highest ideals the world has ever known. Of the more than 13,000,000 Jews now scattered throughout the globe, less than 40,000 are in Jerusalem, and comparatively few in Palestine, owing to war conditions; but Hebrew hearts in all lands will be gladdened by the redemption of the ancient city of their race. Love of the land of their fathers will revive with the new opportunity now within their reach, and Jewish wealth and influence will be lavished in restoring Jerusalem, until it becomes once again "the joy and desire of the whole earth." Should the fortunes of war let it remain in Christian hands, it will be transformed, and its former glories and attractions revived. It will become the Holy City, not of the Jews alone, but of all who name the name of Christ, whether Protestant, Catholic, Anglican, Greek, Syrian or Gregorian.

Not even the most ardent Zionist looks for a wholesale emigration of Jews to Palestine. All, however, look forward to the day when it will once more become the seat of the ancient race, with all the dignity of a self-governing state, under the protection of the Christian powers, whose citizens will unite in bringing to pass that which the Hebrew prophets have so clearly foreshadowed.

An Interesting Parallel

WE doubt whether any writer whose genius has gladdened the world in the last two and a half centuries has furnished as many subjects for text and illustration as the old Bedford tinker, John Bunyan. Yet how few among the multitudes who have read with delight his "Pilgrim's Progress" know that such a book as "The Holy War"—although every whit as entrancing as the "Progress" itself—was ever written! We are reminded of the fact by the publication of a new poem by Rudyard Kipling, in which he chooses for his subject the war of today and draws a parallel between it and "The Holy War" of Bunyan, which tells how "the famous city of Mansoul" was besieged by King Diabolus "from Eye-gate unto Ear-gate," and how, aided by the plotting and propaganda of his followers, he succeeded in capturing it—

> Likewise the Lords of Looseness
>   That hamper faith and works,
> The perseverance-doubters,
>   The present-comfort shirks,
> And little intellectuals,
>   Who cracked beneath a strain—
> John Bunyan met the helpful set
>   In Charles Second's reign.

One must have read "The Holy War" to appreciate the comparison. The conquest of Mansoul, with its ultimate redemption by the forces of King Shaddai, led by Prince Emmanuel, is told as an allegory of the experience, not only of mankind as a whole, but of every one who passes through the supreme spiritual struggle and is at last emancipated from sin's dominion. Who that has ever read of the tyrannical Lord Will-be-Will, who served Diabolus so faithfully, or of Mr. Affection, with his strange family, Recorder Forget-good, the legal mischief-maker, Mr. Haughty, Mr. No-Truth, Mr. Cheating, Mr. Atheism and all the rest of that brood of wickedness, can fail to see that Bunyan understood the worst aspects of human nature as well as the best?

We would be glad to hear from any of our friends who have read "The Holy War," and also from those who would like to read it, since it deals with the "eternal conflict" of good against evil, righteousness against sin, in the soul and life of man in all the ages, and which has an especial application just now.

The Cost of Woman

HAD Adam known that his rib was to be taken and turned into a woman, would he have consented?

A woman's club raises the question. The woman of today, like Pandora of old, is bound to pry into things and turn loose upon the world a lot of troubles.

That stolen rib of Adam's was supposed to be a closed incident. The borrowed member was long since restored to man. For countless generations he has had the rib as well as the woman close to his heart. Man wasn't worrying over the rib affair at all. He had all but forgotten it.

But woman, womanlike, must, of course, prod him out of his complacent forgetfulness and demand that he tell her whether or not he is sorry that she is in existence. To be sure, she has confidence in his gallantry and expects a complimentary reply.

But, after all, the profitable and vital question at this late time is not as to what Adam might have done had choice been his, but what the man of today is willing to give up in exchange for woman and the fulness of her blessings.

Today, as in Adam's time, man must sacrifice in order to win the rich treasures of womanhood.

Man today, as always, must supply the material to make the woman who is really his own counterpart. She is more exacting now than she was. She requires more than a rib.

It may be a temper he must curb, a disposition he must train, habits he must conquer, appetites he must restrain, pet vices he must give up, to cultivate the love and faith and trust and sympathy that make woman truly a joy and blessing.

Real Athleticism

AN athletic authority says that thirty-five is the maximum age for a good athlete.

Perhaps most people have noticed that professional athletes wear themselves out young. Prize-fighters, sprinters and circus performers quit in early prime.

But are these the real athletes?

How much more true an athlete is the well-preserved farmer who at sixty-five, can pitch as much hay as his son or grandson?

The best athleticism is that which holds through the riper years and enables a man to sit on his horse as erectly at sixty as at twenty.

The kind of athleticism that fails at thirty-five is the wrong kind of athleticism. It is the tense, violent, virtuoso sort of skill in mere spectacular accomplishment.

The proof of real athleticism is health and activity in old age. Happy and healthful old age is the final proof of right living.

The Treasures of the Snow

THE air is still. A shower of white descends, first lightly, then the flakes come thick and fast, shutting out vision of distance and mantling all surroundings with a covering at once beneficent and beautiful. Snow is falling and ice forming—it is winter. The vegetable kingdom lies inert, and nature feels decay; barren trees, brown and bare woodlands, silence in forsaken harvest fields, frozen pastures, deserted, shriveled-up gardens, have little in them to recall the summer's beauty and the grandeur of the fall. As if ashamed at the destruction wrought by its withering blasts and the desolation following in its wake, the Northwind brings its robe of purest white and with it veils all nature and hides its forbidding aspect. Gone are the ferns, the ivy is lost to view; buds and shoots are encased in ice and waving stalks and tall grasses are bent beneath a soft mantle. Desolation and decay seem rampant; no sound is heard from feathered throats save the occasional caw-caw of the crow, the shrill whistle of the blue-jay, or the hoot of an owl.

And yet winter, with storm and cold, does not mean decay, nor does snow hide destruction, but on the contrary. Relieved of the necessity of feeding leaves, blossom and fruit, the trees are now making roots; the shrubs, under the warm and protecting snow, are storing up moisture and nourishment for berry and bloom, and soft perennial tendrils are resting awaiting the strenuous spring days when they must needs put forth new effort for beauteous effect and sweetest perfume; new leaves are made and are secured in ice from harm by winter's severity or a too early thaw. Sleeping all and resting, tucked away securely and peacefully expectant of next year's sunshine and blossoms. Sleeping, yet busy, each preparing for next year's usefulness and beauty under the snow. This year's withered foliage is making food for next year's growing; this year's fallen leaves are disintegrating into substances necessary for next year's thriving; this year's blossoms have furnished the seeds now germinating and sprouting for next year's bloom; the frost is breaking up the clods, the snow fertilizing them, ready for next year's planting. The tearing winds are ridding trees of dead wood to make room for new and better twigs and limbs. And so renewal goes on and nothing is lost. Would we have cooling shade for our vacation walks, sweet flowers for our bridals, luscious vegetables and juicy fruits for our tables? Then we must have snow; for the trees, the buds, the plants of all kinds cannot thrive without it. "Hast thou entered into the treasures of the snow?" was one of the questions propounded to Job by the Voice in the storm. Far more than for cold and destruction are its treasures marked by fructification and blessing.

The Alien

A Christmas Fantasy

by CURT HANSEN

YOU could tell from his white thin hands and his finely cut head that he was of gentle blood, just as you could tell from his speech that he was a polished scholar. His chin was somewhat too firm, said the Mecklenburgers; his lips a bit too tight. He was just a little too rigid to be a parson, this Dr. Röhrwitz, but no one questioned his zeal or orthodoxy.

While he sat at his study table on Christmas eve after prayers, and after the children—his two and their friends—had sung their decorous songs and caught a glimpse of the magnificent Christmas tree in the dining-room while he sat half-smiling at the anticipated delight of their awakening to the presents each one so eagerly desired, he felt a glow of satisfaction in the thought that the measured and upright life he had planned from earliest youth had been so bountifully realized. He was rich. He was venerated. God had been very good to him.

Jürgen, the factotum, knocked at the door. "Some one down-stairs, your reverence. Seems to be a Jew pedlar."

Dr. Röhrwitz frowned. Just then he felt more than ever aloof from Jew pedlars. "What does he want?"

"He is snow-bound. He wants to stay overnight."

"Nothing else? Characteristic Jew impudence. Give him a mark and tell him to go."

Jürgen hesitated: "It's——"

"It's what?"

"It's very bad weather."

Dr. Röhrwitz started angrily. "Is this a hotel? Why did he leave Tempan so late? He knew very well that there is no house between Tempan and Gurdstock but this one. Where is he?"

"In the kitchen."

PASTOR RÖHRWITZ stamped down to the kitchen. Near the outside door stood the stranger, a huddled, unprepossessing figure. His clothes were in a wretched condition and had evidently afforded him but little protection against the driving sleet outside. Nor had the man himself any of the Oriental picturesqueness of some of his people. His features were rather Slavonic than Hebraic, and his broken German and guttural accent betrayed him at once as a Polish Jew. The huge pack lay in a corner of the kitchen in a pool made by the water that dripped from it. A frayed woolen cap was gripped in his two hands.

"To what," said the pastor, ironically, "am I indebted for the honor of this visit?"

"Ehrwürden will pardon me, but——"

"Never mind—never mind. I know all about it. The real facts are that you counted on staying here overnight. Thought the Goyyim are generous on Christmas."

"I was delayed at a peasant's house, Ehrwürden."

"Yes, I have no doubt. Well, what room do you want? The guest-chamber or mine?"

A dark flush spread over the pedlar's features. "If I may stay in the kitchen," he said, "I will go when the storm is over."

The cook protested. The kitchen was newly scoured. God knows what this fellow carried on his person. She objected.

"And you are quite right, Anna," said the pastor. "Itzig," he went on, turning to the Jew.

"Not Itzig, Ehrwürden, my name——"

"Oh, what do I care what your name is—Schmul or Moses or Itzig! Follow Jürgen to the barn. I can't quite turn you out, though you deserve it. March!"

Dr. Röhrwitz turned to go to his study. He had done his duty. He could not well turn out even such a wretch into the storm. But the whole incident had lamentably disturbed the serenity of the season.

"When everything is said and done, a Jew is a Jew," he repeated to himself. It was a favorite phrase of his, often effectively used in conversation.

Jürgen was not long. When he came back to report he found the pastor engrossed in his book. Jürgen briefly stated what he had done and withdrew, and Dr. Röhrwitz continued his close study of the volume before him—"The Parables of Jesus in Their Literary and Ethical Aspects." It was a fascinating presentment. He was still at it at eleven when Jürgen passed his room to retire for the night. It was the doctor's intention to finish it that night.

THE neighborhood was a peaceful one. The Röhrwitz house, isolated though it was, was doubly protected by its character and the well-known fact that a number of able-bodied servants were on the premises. As far as Dr. Röhrwitz could remember, there was no record of even an attempted robbery. But there was no doubt that some one was moving down-stairs.

No doubt whatever. People were moving to and fro—softly, to be sure, but unmistakably. Even voices could be heard, the doctor could swear it.

Laying his book down, he walked to the hallway. The sounds were quite distinct—both movement and voices. From where he stood it seemed as if the rascals had turned on the light.

Now, that was too much. The pastor was a brave, if quick-tempered, man. He buttoned up his coat and started for the stairs.

All his suspicions were confirmed. A flood of mellow soft light came from the dining-room. Somebody was there with a vengeance. Dr. Röhrwitz stamped to the door, fuming. Any possibility of fear was lost in an overwhelming rage. But suddenly he stopped and caught his breath with a gasp.

THERE was no light in the room except the Christmas tree. Every candle on it—candles that had not yet been kindled by him—burned with a bright and steady flame. A tender glow enveloped and suffused the room. And the air was filled with a fine rustling—almost a murmur—of the fir-needles slowly swaying to and fro, moved by an imperceptible wind.

There were several people in the room. The one that took his eye first was a tall man, perfectly black, arrayed in fantastic bright-colored garments. No negro, however, for his luminous dark skin shone like ebony, and his nose was straight and his forehead high. Behind him appeared two others—a grave old man whose white beard was lost in the ermine facing of a loose blue mantle, and another, younger, black-bearded and stately, somewhat haughty in bearing, but with benignity mingled in the severity of his look.

Dr. Röhrwitz stood stupefied. What mummery was this? Who were these men that presumed to masquerade in his house?

The first one greeted him at once. "Peace be with you, brother."

Röhrwitz found voice to ask. "Who are you? What do you want? What are you doing here?"

"You do not know us?" There was a tinge of reproach in the tone.

"I—" The angry retort died away. Perhaps he did know them. "Who are you?"

"I am Caspar of Ethiopia. And the others—surely you know them Melchior and Balthasar. We followed the Star to Bethlehem years ago—many years ago—and we greeted the King at his first coming. Since then, every year, we seek him again. Every year we go to greet him, wheresoever he may be. Never yet have we failed him."

"You seek him!" It was a shuddering whisper that came from Dr. Röhrwitz. His body shook and the cold sweat stood on his forehead. "Here—in my house!"

"Wherever he may be, where the star leads us. Look!"

Through the window gleamed a point of light, painful in its brightness. Röhrwitz covered his face.

"In my house!" he repeated. "Here! In my house! God is gracious to a sinner." And the awe of the moment almost gave way to a sense of exultant pride.

Still the rustling went on, an undefined, formless harmony.

"He comes," said Melchior.

"Where is he?" gasped Röhrwitz, and sank to his knees. "I cannot see him. O God, that I might see him!"

"He comes," said Balthasar.

THEN out from the crisp cold night—no trace of storm or sleet now—came a chant. Röhrwitz could distinguish neither words nor melody. A chant swelling like a rolling wave of sound, loud, triumphant. The house rocked with it. A fragrance filled his nostrils.

"He is here," said Caspar.

A step was heard in the hall. No effulgence of light marked the place; but the chant had grown till its thunder reverberated between the two worlds, and a thousand thousand voices sang Hosanna. Röhrwitz and the Three Kings stared in adoration at the door.

In the threshold stood the Jew pedlar. His torn and shining coat was covered with stable straw. The woolen cap was twirled in his chapped hands. The eyes were sunken even more deeply in their sockets. His hat fell from his fingers, and as the hands spread out to bless, crimson and dripping appeared the stigmata of the Sacrifice.

Röhrwitz flung his arms over his face in horror. "Thou! Thou! And I knew thee not."

A great sob shook him and he fell prone to the floor.

So he lay until the chant died away and the rustling of the fir-needles ceased—until the lights faded from the tree, and he felt around him the still darkness of the large and empty room.

The pastor raised his head. He was sitting in his study. Before him was an open book. The study lamp had burned itself out. For half an hour Dr. Röhrwitz sat motionless.

Then he ran to the stairs and called, "Jürgen!" It took some time to rouse the man, but he persisted until Jürgen stumbled down, half-clad.

"Jürgen," said the pastor, "put on my coat, go to the stable and bring him——"

"The Jew?" asked Jürgen wondering.

"Bring him here—to the guest-chamber. I shall prepare it myself."

"The Most Beautiful Letter" She Ever Read

A MOTHER, Oklahoma City, sends us a copy of what she lovingly calls "the most beautiful letter I ever read." And no wonder, for it is the letter of a Christian son to a Christian mother. It is written from one of the home military training camps, where the son (who enlisted at twenty-two) is now located.

"MY DEAR LITTLE MOTHER: I received your letter and was awfully glad to hear. I got the cookies, as you know by this time, and I sure enjoyed them. I also received the five dollars and can use it, but I can wait just as well for pay-day. I won't need any more, though it was sweet of you to send it. You see, Uncle Sam gives us all the necessaries of life, and outside of a hair-cut now and then, we don't need anything that we can't do without.

"It's awfully sweet of you to knit me a sweater, but I don't want you to be discouraged about the speed you are making on it, as I have plenty of clothes to keep me warm. When it is cold, I wear the little black jersey over my undershirt, and then my gray wool shirt, then my army shirt on top, so you see I'm not likely to freeze. I'll appreciate the sweater when I get it.

"It is sure comical to see these lads roll out in the A. M., stiff and sore from head to foot. We do not drill Friday or Saturday afternoons, nor Sundays, so we get a chance to clean up and rest up. And, by the way, I went to the Y. M. C. A. while in Chattanooga and had a fine hot shower-bath, and it sure felt good. We have a fine bunch of men for our officers, and I like them very much. Everything is as clean as a pin; no mother need fear for her boy in such surroundings as I have seen so far. We have very good grub, though plain, and it is well balanced dietetically. We had roast beef, gravy, bread, sweet potatoes and peach pie for dinner; minced ham, cheese, pickles, bread and tea for supper. I have gained two pounds since I came.

"Mother, I don't want you to feel discouraged about anything, for 'all things work together for good to those that love the Lord,' and I have had such wonderful assurance of his presence and love since I have been in the army. And I cannot cease to be thankful that I have a mother who has been faithful in the charge laid upon her by the Lord, and who has seen my feet well planted in the straight and narrow way. A mother who has done this for her children cannot count her life in any way a failure, for they are the Lord's, and what they amount to after they are grown is between them and the Lord. I am going to Chattanooga next Sunday, and go to B. Y. P. U. I miss it very much, and I expect to have a good time. You never see a woman around this camp any more than if they didn't exist.

"As I get a better view of life from its various viewpoints, any temporary limitations are as nothing to the pure and final joys of a Christian life. I want you to write and tell me just what you are discouraged about. If there is anything you want to unload, just write and tell me about it, because I love you, and any load is easier for two than for one.

"With lots of love, I am your big

THE STAR AN

By

CHARLES GR

The Stars Led the Wise Men to the Child
And the Children Lead Us to the Stars

IT seems as if on Christmas Day an unseen angel touches the invisible spring of an unused window in human nature, letting into our souls a flood of celestial song and sunshine, and giving us a brief but glorious glimpse outward and upward beyond the small and sordid things of earth.

This angel, descending unto us today direct from the presence of God, is the Spirit of childhood.

Happy today is the man or woman in whom the bitter, blighting worldly lusts and passions have not crushed out the childlike spirit.

We may rightly interpret the deep meaning of Christmas and fully sense its blessedness, not alone through the children about us, but through the childlikeness that still lingers within ourselves.

As the Star of old led the wise men to the Babe in the manger for the secret inspiration for peace on earth and good will toward men, so must the Star of Love lead us to the childlike spirit of humility within ourselves for a real appreciation of this day and a right understanding of life.

"And a little child shall lead them."

Therein lies the hope of humanity, not for the next world alone, but for this.

The joyous laughter of the delighted children is the Christmas music that sets the heartstrings into quick vibration.

WE call the Christmas bells sweet, but they would sound solemn and meaningless but for their accompaniment of joyous shouts and laughter of the little ones. The joy of a child is the only perfect happiness in the world. And it is so easy to cause.

This is why Christmas, the day on which we all unite in giving joy to the children, is the nearest approach mankind can make to a foretaste of heaven.

Let us remember that Christmas is supremely the day for the children, and that our own best joy must lie in making them as happy as we can.

What a glorious feast of universal gladness the day would be if every man and woman in selecting gifts were to take care first of all to make at least one little child supremely happy.

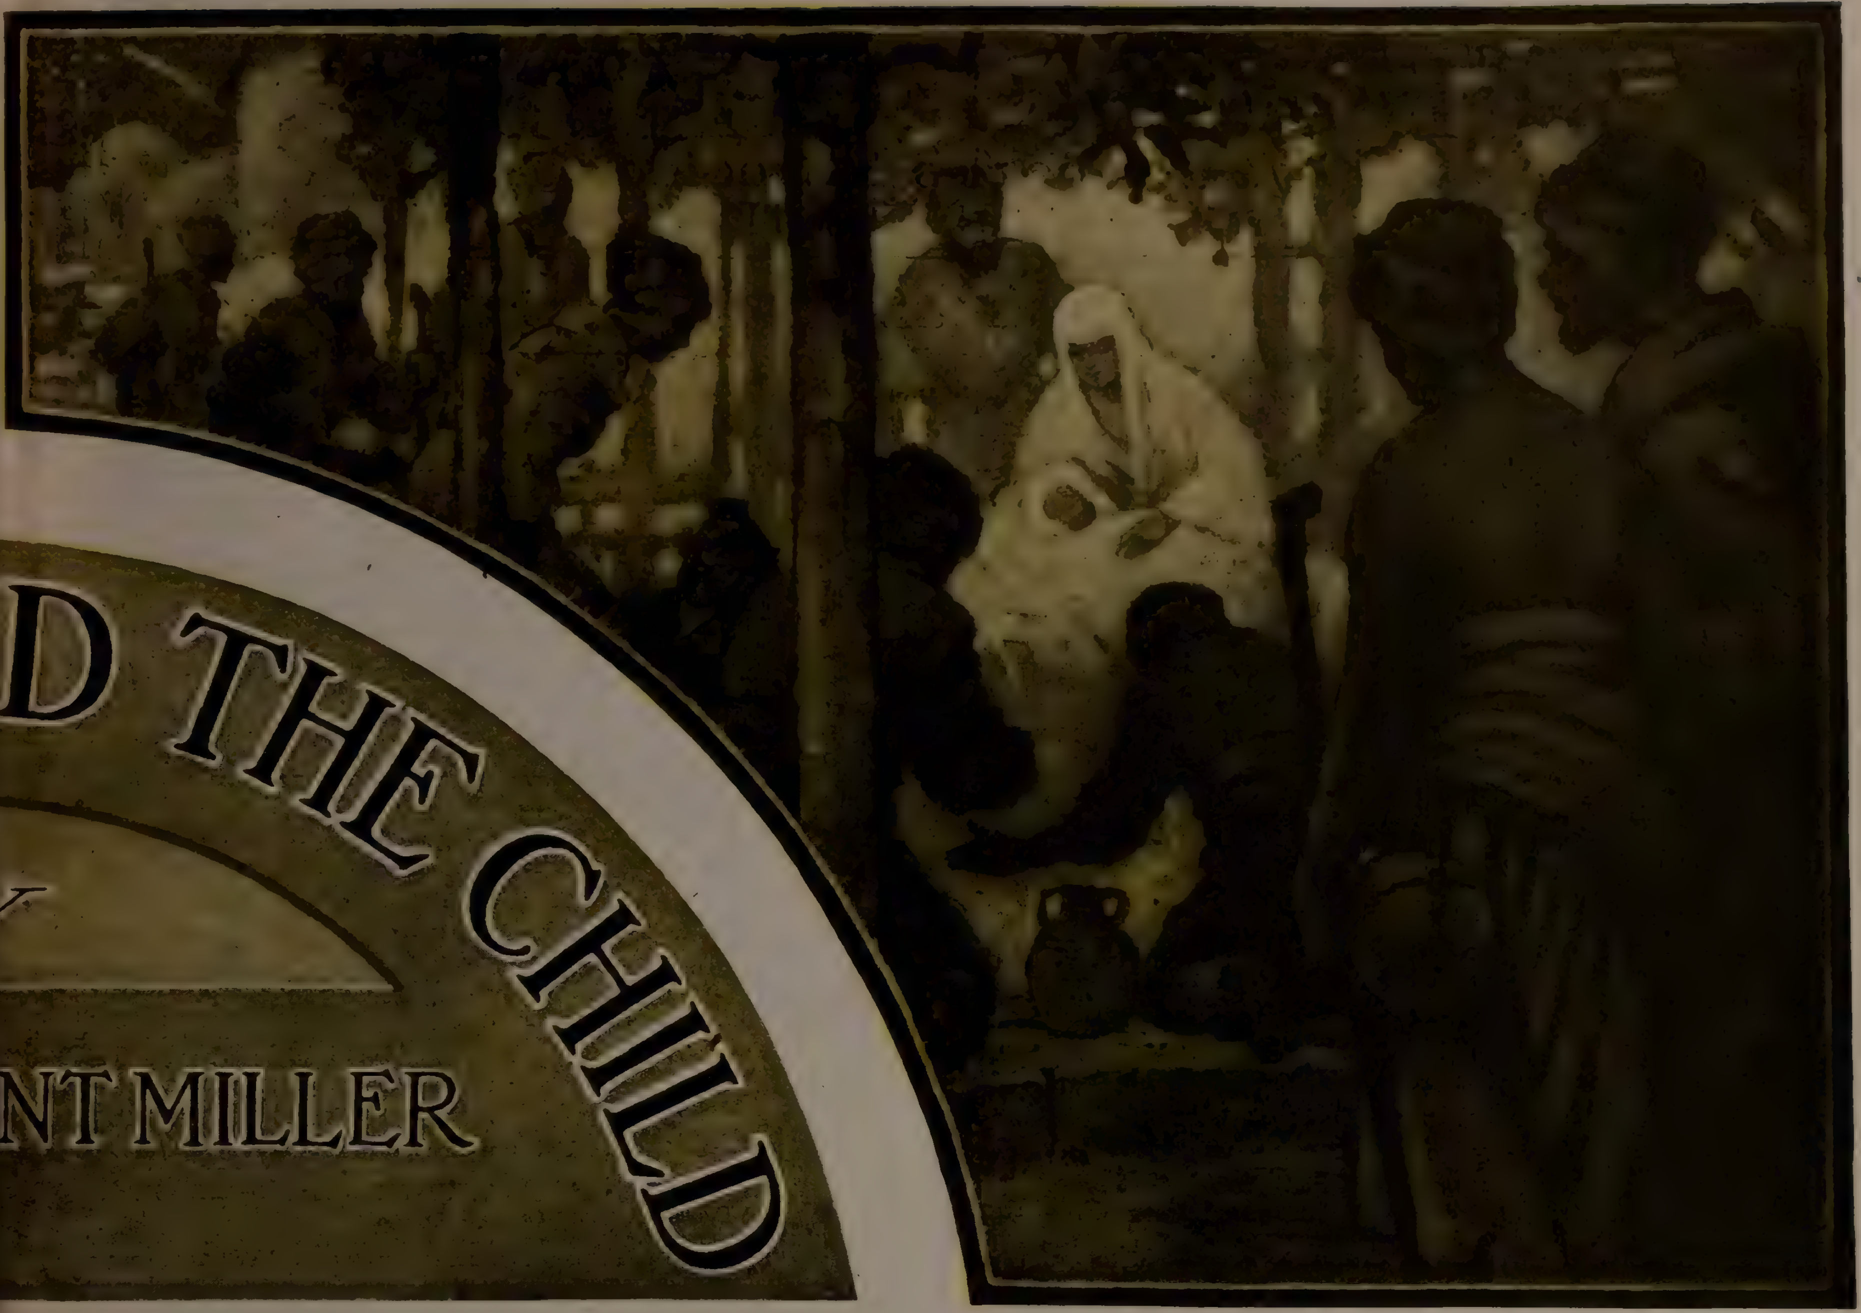
There is opportunity enough. If one's own children and those of one's friends are supplied, there still are plenty o children of the friendless.

They swarm in the alleys, where the dollar that if spen on some grown-up friend would bring scarcely a smile o pleasure, will, divided into a dozen gifts, bring shouts of jo from a dozen young hearts to which joy is rare.

It is the sweetest music in the world.

D THE CHILD

NT MILLER



THE babe Jesus, whose birth we celebrate, has departed from us, but the Christ-message, the divine image and likeness, remains ever with us, and its purest interpreter among us and of us is the child.

For things hidden from the wise and prudent have been revealed unto babes.

Fresh from the Creator and uncontaminated by selfishness or greed or malice or envy, the child is the cleanest exemplar allotted to us of Truth and Love. By these unfading, unfaltering stars the child ever points to our mist-enclouded souls the way.

We may not hope to attain to perfect childlike truth and love, even on Christmas Day. But the mariner who steers steadily by the fixed star steers right, and though storms may carry him from his course he some day reaches his harbor safe.

Love for the innocent child is love for the Christ, for we are told that as we do unto the least of these, we do unto the Father. Even the atheist and scoffer in his love for children worships in his heart the God whom his mind denies.

Thus the child leads us to the stars.

Small share of the possible blessings of this day are for the man who, however freely he gives baubles to the child, neglects to reflect upon the love that alone can illumine and uplift his own soul.

Even the precious gold, frankincense and myrrh laid by the three kings at the feet of the child Jesus would have had no value or meaning if not accompanied by the hearts of the givers.

WE may give lavishly of material things, but it is that which we give of ourselves that turns us starward.

The stars—our highest ideals.

They are far above the earth and we may not reach them; but the force that has lifted man from brute creation is that of his ideals. Without that he would have been as helpless as one who tries to lift himself by his bootstraps—more helpless still—for he would have known no desire to be lifted at all.

Darwin's theory of the epigenesis of the eagle is richly suggestive. The wish to ascend was there before the wings, and through ages of longing, steady development and adaptation went on until at last with mighty pinions the eagle soared triumphantly aloft toward the sun.

With us, too, ideals are transforming forces, and exalted wishes become lifting wings.

Every instinct lying at the source of man's moral nature requires that there be a time in the year when for at least a few brief hours self may be forgotten, the heart turned tender and the hard passions softened, friends be drawn more closely and enemies forgiven, peace descend upon us, and the little children lead us.

"HOWARD CHASE"

By Pastor Charles M. Sheldon

Author of "IN HIS STEPS"

SYNOPSIS OF PREVIOUS INSTALMENTS

HOWARD CHASE, a young Congregational minister, single, receives a call from a church in Red Hill, a village of seven hundred people in Kansas. After consulting with his classmate and chum, Roy Lennox, he accepts the call and leaves with his sister Rose for his new field, where he is received by Mr. Burton, a deacon of his new church, and his daughter Agnes, and taken to the parsonage, and afterward introduced to the pastors of the Methodist, Presbyterian and Baptist churches.

"HOW often does a new man come to this church?" asked Howard.

"Well, I'm the oldest resident minister, and I've been here seven years. The other churches have all changed pastors several times since I came."

There was rather an awkward pause.

"Is this a church-going community?" Howard asked, studying Brother Gray meanwhile.

"No. This town is given over to all sorts of organizations. We have to fight for our lives with everything you can imagine. We have two moving picture shows that keep the people away from prayer meeting, and dancing and whist parties have killed the spiritual life of the people. They have no spiritual hunger. They are given up to amusement and money-making and gossip. It's the most gossipy town in the state, Brother Chase."

"Looks like a good town for a preacher to work in," said Howard. "Full of sinners. I'm glad I came."

Brother Gray stared, and then laughed his short staccato laugh again.

"Oh, you'll have plenty to do that way. And a new broom—you know. But people don't go to church here. After a few weeks, when they get used to you, you'll be preaching to empty pews like the rest of us."

"Not on your life I won't!" Howard exclaimed with so much emphasis that Brother Gray started back and his face grew red. "If you think I have come here to preach to empty pews you have another guess coming."

Gray looked at him more closely, and a new look came into his face.

"You'll forgive me, my young brother, won't you, for speaking as I did about the people? But I get discouraged at times and can't help talking out. And the people do appear to be so indifferent and so lacking in spiritual response. I don't want to discourage you. Go ahead! If you can get a hearing I hope you will."

Howard detected a hint of a tear in the man's eye and he said to himself, "Perhaps I'm going to take to Brother Gray after all."

HE went out of the store and back to his little study in the parsonage meditating on the things Brother Gray had said and his way of saying them.

And many times, shutting himself into that little room, and last of all, late on the Saturday night, he prayed on his knees for the power of the Spirit in his Sunday services, as he should face his first Red Hill congregation.

It was somewhat different from his mental picture of it. Somehow Red Hill, in the three days that had elapsed since Howard's arrival, seemed to be unusually attracted to the new young preacher of the Congregational Church, and when Howard began the service on that memorable Sunday morning he faced a real crowd, the biggest crowd, Deacon Burton proudly said at dinner, that ever went to church in Red Hill.

"Did you notice the Baptist and M. E. and Presbyterian folks this morning?" he had said exultantly to his wife and daughter as they eagerly discussed the service. "I saw at least forty from Gray's membership and thirty from the M. E., and more than a score from Harris's. I don't believe they had more than a handful at all their churches."

As a matter of fact, by actual count as Red Hill knew before the day was over, less than 125 people all told were in attendance at the three other churches.

The little annex was open and every chair occupied. One row of extra chairs was put down the main aisle. Chairs were brought over from the parsonage and put in the front part of the little vestibule. And a crowd of men and boys stood up along the walls, and at Howard's suggestion before he went forward to the platform some of the older boys were asked to sit on the platform itself, a thing unheard of in the history of the church.

As he went up to the pulpit he knew that Red Hill collectively was taking critical account of him, of his bearing, his clothes, his general appearance. But as he put his foot on the first step there was not a tremor in his heart, not a nervous thrill, nothing but a great hunger to get at his message to the people. It was not egotism; it was simply the hunger to preach, the longing of the prophet to say "Thus saith the Lord."

HE had taken his seat and the girl at the organ had begun playing, when he noticed on the inner side of the pulpit, lying close up against the raised part that held the big Bible, a spray of double lilac blossoms. It had evidently been placed there. The sight of them swept his memory back to Union Seminary and Roy Lennox's whimsical statement — "flowers will adorn your pulpit"—and at the thought of it he caught himself grinning and then stopped—as he turned his head and saw for the first time the girl at the organ, Agnes Burton.

She had been away with a friend and had not returned home until late Saturday, and so he had not met her on his visits to the deacon's, where he had gone three or four times to consult about church matters.

She seemed at first wholly intent on her music, but as Howard turned in that brief moment her face seemed to convey to him a knowledge of his look that for one second struck him almost like a blow.

Could such a face— Could it be possible the flowers were— It was a thought that had less than lightning's vision—and it was gone—he had arisen, they were singing the Doxology, he was being swept along in the fervor of the service, and naught else was of value. Woman? She might have her place—but not now—all the world contained for the next hour only one matter of supreme importance, and he was carried away with it.

He stood up when the sermon was reached, his whole splendid animal beauty intensified by his fiery consecration and absorbing purpose to get at the real lives before him. The people of Red Hill had never seen anything like it. His text was "In the Unity of the Spirit" and a plea for that oneness of personal and community life that should transform the individual and the town into a new life in Christ Jesus his Lord.

The girl at the organ sat with clasped hands and burning cheeks, and eyes that never drooped but once, and that was when he turned to include the young people in the choir with a passionate plea; the people in the pews leaned forward as one person; the men in the back part of the vestibule stood with hands on one another's shoulders; the rich beauty of the May splendor of the spring prairie floated into the open windows, and a quiet hush like that one feels at a benediction when the Spirit has filled the house fell on all hearts, as that notable ministry of Howard Chase began at Red Hill.

CHAPTER II

Howard Chase, Red Hill, Kansas

WHEN Monday morning dawned over Red Hill, one theme of conversation mingled with the coffee and toast over the breakfast tables and up and down the one main business street. And the new minister furnished the topic.

Down at the Santa Fe station the Agent pulled the baggage truck up to the end of the platform where the mail car of Number Five stopped.

The Expressman was there leaning up against the back of his wagon.

"That was some preaching yesterday. No?" said the Agent as he hooked up the handle of the truck.

"It sure was," said the Expressman. I come pretty near goin' in the evening. I did get up to the door, but I couldn't get in."

"If you don't look out you'll get to be a regular old church goer," said the Agent as he started up the platform.

"Shouldn't wonder. Goin' next Sunday if I can get in."

The Agent stopped, looked back at the Expressman and grinned.

"Why don't you ask him for a seat on the platform?"

"And I bet he'd give me one if I did," said the Expressman, standing a little straighter up against his wagon.

"I'm sure he would," replied the Agent. "He'd give you his own high-backed chair."

UP on the street Deacon Burton was talking with George Clark, editor of the Red Hill Sun, the county paper.

"What do you think of our new minister, George? Didn't he do us proud yesterday?"

"Yes—" Clark replied, a little cautiously. "But do you think he can keep it up? Struck me he started off on high gear with the muffler wide open. Do you think he can stand the pace?"

"That isn't the question. Do you think we can stand it? We've never had any one like him before. Why, he just naturally got a hold of me before he got both feet off the train the other day."

"He's a likely young fellow all right," Clark assented. "Wonder what the other preachers think of him."

"And wonder what he thinks of them," Deacon Burton grinned.

"I don't believe he gives a rap about them. He acts to me as if there weren't any other preachers in Red Hill but just himself."

"How would you have him act?" Deacon Burton asked a little sharply.

Clark stared and then laughed.

"Of course I wouldn't have him act any other way. But we can't expect to keep a young fellow like that in Red Hill. He's cut out for a metropolitan pulpit. He won't stay here long."

"I don't suppose he will." Deacon Burton said it with a note of reluctance. "He's too rich for our blood. But the church is bound to grow while he is here. Why, do you know there was men in church last night I never saw inside of any church, and thought I never would see there until they were in their coffins."

Clark picked up the bundle he had bought and started to go out.

"He sure has 'em going. He was around to see me early this morning to get out some special dodgers for Sunday evening meetings. He isn't going to give you saints any ease in Zion."

"Nor you sinners any in the other place," retorted Deacon Burton, who knew Clark well enough to remonstrate with him nearly every time he saw him about his not being a church member.

George Clark was one of a score of business men in Red Hill who were rated "as good as church members" but never professed Christianity in a personal way and had never joined a church. He attended with greater regularity than most of the members, contributed generously to the support of the church regardless of the preacher, and was counted a regular "supporter" of the church. His daughter Inez sang in the young people's chorus and helped her father get out the paper, setting type, reading copy, editing the letters from country correspondents, and serving as general utility help in the office. She had graduated from the High School two years before the eventful Sunday that marked the advent of the new Congregational minister, and had won an enviable reputation with the other girls for amateur dramatics. When the class at its annual "confession" had read their own life histories, Inez had said with a frankness that was so free from any attempt at pretense that it voiced her deepest ambitions:

"Well, people, I am going to be a movie actress. They say some of them get as much as eight hundred dollars a week. And I am willing to do any stunts they ask. And I've been practicing one or two."

There she stopped provokingly, while the other girls and the four boys who belonged to the class dared her to tell what the stunts were. But Inez shook her head and no appeals could make her reveal her secret.

This is what she saw again as she sat there grave and wide-eyed in the face of the noisy chatter on the high school steps.

NUMBER Nine of the Santa Fe came roaring through Red Hill at 4:32 A.M. First intimation of it was a faint hum out back of Red Hill as the engine opened up on the long curve that swung around the slope, and then if the wind was southwest, suddenly the hum would swell into the crash of the drivers on the rails and the whole length of the train would strike up its diapason as it swung down the grade through the bridge over the creek and then flung itself past the little station with a crescendo of mingling noises, wheel and rail and switch and empty station and swaying coaches all joining in together with a grand burst of power that always thrilled Inez as she often lay awake to hear Number Nine go swinging through the little sleeping town, its roar dying out as it began like the Turkish patrol, and the prairie stretches would fall back again into the slumber from which Number Nine had rudely awakened them. Ever since she was a little girl, Number Nine, due at 4:32 A.M., had been an awesome thing, alive and with a great beating heart; and when its long white eye first showed around the curve of Red Hill she used to shrink back with fear as she lay awake looking out of the little window at the monster approaching the empty little station with leaping strides as if to tear it to pieces as it thundered past.

But one morning she had helped her father off with an early breakfast on account of some rush county printing, and after he was gone and she had begun to do up the dishes, suddenly the thought of Number Nine due in half an hour seemed to speak to her with the rhythm of the car wheel pounding up and down in her temples; and then with a flash came her resolve to try a thing that one of the moving pictures given by one of the show places in town had suggested; and after standing a moment by the kitchen sink she finished wiping the few dishes, put them back in the cupboard, ran up into her room, caught up a light scarf, throwing it around her head as she came out of the house, paused a moment on the steps, then closed the door gently and ran down toward the track, only two blocks away.

Finland's Declaration of Independence

THE Finnish government has just declared its independence of Russia. On introducing the autonomy bill in the Diet Mr. Swinhurd, the premier, declared that the government based the bill on the full independence of Finland. Measures are being taken to have Finnish independence internationally recognized. Finland has prospered in many ways in spite of Russia's misrule. Under the absolute monarchy the people of Finland were goaded to the point of revolution. Under the limited monarchy the fires of liberty were fanned into a flame, and when their ruling government went to pieces the people found that it was their opportunity to become an independent nation. When the people of Finland were starving the Christian Herald was God's hand of love to carry them bread. May 1918 be the first of many happy New Years for Finland. In the declaration of independence by Finland we have another evidence of the movement of the world toward a universal democracy. It was appropriate for Finland to take the blessed Christmas season for the declaration of her independence, for the Babe came to bring the largest measure of individual and personal liberty to men. The prophet thus expresses the thought: "He hath sent me to bind up the broken-hearted, to proclaim liberty to the captives, and the opening of the prison to them that are bound." (Isa. 61 : 1.)

Bethlehem, Famed of Earth

THE eyes of the civilized world turn to Bethlehem because the only perfect man who ever lived was born there, and because God selected it to be the birthplace of his only Son. The modern Bethlehem (which means "house of bread") is a village six miles from Jerusalem, unwalled, with white stone houses, including notable buildings, the one over the supposed place of the Nativity erected by the wife of a Roman Emperor in the third century A. D., and a huge stone mausoleum claimed to have been the tomb of Rachel. It is not the modern Bethlehem we care for, but the old one where Christ was born attracts the notice and love of our hearts. The village was famed long before the Babe came to the manger. There Jacob lived and dug a well, and there the light of his life went out when his first love, Rachel, died and he buried her out of sight. Here David was born and, a humble shepherd lad, watched his father's flocks on the neighboring hills. This is why Christ happened to be born there. Augustus Cæsar, who ruled the world, was restoring order and soundness to the finances of the empire after the exhaustion of war, and laid a murderous tribute on all the provinces, the land of the Jews included. So Joseph and Mary of the lineage of David were ordered to go to David's home town, Bethlehem, to be enrolled for taxation. And on that journey the child Jesus was born. There was room in the town tavern that night for the fishermen, and farmers, and merchants, but not for God's Messiah, who was crowded out into a half cave cattle stable to be born. The one heaven sent from the highest pinnacle in the universe had to go to the lowliest place on earth to be born, that he might carry the lowliest and most sinful of earth back with him to the White Throne. The important fact is that the Babe born is our real living Lord and Saviour today, and our Christmas will be most fittingly celebrated by our incarnation of his Spirit, and imitation of his service of love. The prophet thus fortells the birthplace of Christ: "But thou, Bethlehem Ephratah, though thou be little among the thousands of Judah, yet out of thee shall come forth unto me that is to be ruler in Israel; whose goings forth have been from of old, from everlasting." (Micah 5 : 2.)

Girl Street Car Conductors

TWENTY-FIVE young women have just finished a course of instruction and have been installed as conductors on the surface street car lines of New York City. It may be that other cities have adopted this innovation. Soon most of them will have done so to take the places of the men who have gone to war. The young women of New York took their first trips under supervision of instructors whose chief duty it was to see that the new employees did not start the cars too soon and give rise to accidents and damage suits. Miss Etta Heine began her first trip at 6:40 o'clock in the morning on a Seventh Avenue car. When she got her first fare she rang it up and handed the grinning passenger a transfer, for which he said "Thank you, Miss." She and a number of the other novices traveled on their cars from One Hundred and Forty-sixth Street and Lenox Avenue to the Battery without a single mistake. The wages of the girl conductors are 27 cents an hour for a ten-hour day, with two hours off for luncheon. At first the little newsboy will giggle and joke about the "hen conductors," and men and women will look with curiosity on the first that make the runs, but the people will get used to it and not regret the change which exigencies have required. Besides teaching the girls not to start the car too soon, the instructors must teach them not to start their tongues too soon. They will have instant and constant occasion for hasty and rash words if they are not careful. For while the traveling public as a rule is good-humored and polite, there are always one or two ill-natured cranks in every car who count it their duty and privilege to jaw the waiter in the restaurant and quarrel with the street car conductor. Let the instructor tell them to be very patient in dealing with such and say nothing, reminding them that an ill-humored, saucy conductor is as great a nuisance in the car as the crank passenger. There is the record of a woman doing a man's work in the harvest field near the village where Christ was born, marrying the rich owner of the farm, and becoming the great-grandmother of David. Here it is: "So she kept fast by the maidens of Boaz to glean unto the end of barley harvest and of wheat harvest, and dwelt with her mother-in-law." (Ruth 2 : 23.)

Baron Morimura's Faith

WHAT a princely figure Baron Morimura is in Japan and the Christian world! One of the most beautiful and inspiring sentiments is the supreme faith in Christ expressed in the following letter: "A certain newspaper editor came to me and asked to know the secret of my success, and my answer was that I had not perfectly succeeded. The editor answered that as a boy I was poor and now a very rich man, and wished to know how I rose in the world of commerce and received my present rank as baron. I told him that in my eighty years I had succeeded in one thing, and that was in being a Christian at eighty years of age. Christ gave me light at that age, and I rejoice that I have eternal life ahead of me. This is also possible for my brethren. This faith is the foundation of all that I possess." Victor Hugo at eighty said the same thing, attributing his success and happiness in this life and hope of the more glorious one beyond to his faith in God. He said: "The snow is on my head, but the flowers are in my heart. My Christian faith makes me certain of my immortality. I have just begun to live. Death will not end but only begin life. Death is only the clock striking twelve to begin another day that shall never end." The Japanese baron is a prince, the child of a King, an heir of God and joint heir with Jesus Christ. The Babe in Bethlehem came into the world with no smaller task than that of saving the whole world, those of every kindred, tribe and tongue, and is gloriously accomplishing his mission. Baron Morimura was right; the only real success in life is to find the Babe in Bethlehem, "who hath abolished death, and hath brought life and immortality to light in the Gospel." (II Tim. 1 : 10.)

Severely Rebukes Best Families

LEARNING that private families in Flushing, Long Island, entertaining soldiers had offered them liquor, Rev. George Drew Egbert, pastor of the First Congregational Church of that place, had the moral courage to administer this nice rebuke: "Let me say that if I come across any instance of any one giving a soldier or sailor liquor, or if any one reliable informs me of any such action on the part of anybody here in Flushing, however high in the social scale he or she may be, or to whatever church he or she may belong, my own or any other, I shall make every effort in my power to obtain the arrest and conviction of the guilty party." But how about the "best families" that offer drink to the young men that visit them who do not belong to the army or navy? Or about a "Christian" community that will license the saloon to destroy the efficiency of the man with his factory or business? To such the heart cry of the best young manhood around these Christmas times is "Lead us not into temptation, but deliver us from evil." (Matt. 6 : 13.)

Newsboys Honor Benefactor

RECENTLY a pyramid monument of stone was dedicated in a cemetery in the city of Toledo, Ohio, by the newsboys to a prominent citizen who in his lifetime had been a warm friend to them. The newsboys themselves took the initiative in the enterprise, enlisting the cooperation of the newsdealers and other friends in the city and throughout the country, and large numbers of school children. The mayor of the city made an address at the dedication. What a beautiful, a Christlike thing it was for this man so to love and help the little newsboys, some of whom are orphans and waifs, and all of whom have to struggle hard at all hours and in all kinds of weather to do their work so important to society. The memorial most abiding is the love and gratitude of the newsboys and of the general public. It is this kind of memorial of loving service to which Christ refers: "Wheresoever this Gospel shall be preached in the whole world, there shall also this, that this woman hath done, be told for a memorial of her." (Matt. 26 : 13.)

The Witness

By GRACE LIVINGSTON HILL LUTZ

IT WAS all arranged by Mother Marshall that Bonnie and he should go to the woods after dinner for greens and a Christmas tree. Bonnie looked at Courtland almost apologetically, wondering if he were too tired for a strenuous expedition like that.

No. Courtland was not tired. He had never been so rested in his life. He felt like hugging Mother Marshall for getting up the plan, for he could see Bonnie never would have proposed it, she was too shy. He donned a pair of Stephen's old leather leggings and a sweater, shouldered the ax quite as if he had ever carried one before, and they started.

He thought he never had seen anything quite so lovely as Bonnie in that fuzzy little woolen cap, with the sunshine of her hair straying out and the fine glow in her beautiful face. He knew he had never heard music half so sweet as Bonnie's laugh as it rang through the woods when she saw a squirrel sitting on a high limb scolding at their intrusion. He completely forgot his lost ideals of womanhood.

THEY set the tree up in the big parlor, and made a great log fire on the hearth to give good cheer—for the house was warm as a pocket without it. They colored and strung popcorn, gilded walnuts, cut silver-paper stars and chains for the tree, and hung strings of cranberries, bright-red apples, and oranges between. They trimmed the house from top to bottom, even twining ground-pine on the stair rail.

Those were the speediest two weeks that Courtland ever spent in his life. He had thought to remain with the Marshalls perhaps three or four days, but instead of that he delayed till the very last train that would get him back to the seminary in time for work, and missed two classes at that. For he had never had a comrade like Bonnie; and he knew, from the first day almost, that he had never known a love like the love that flamed up in his soul for this sweet, strong-spirited girl. The old house rang with their laughter from morning to night as they chased each other upstairs and down, like two children. Hours they spent taking long tramps through the woods or over the country roads; more hours they spent reading aloud to each other, or rather, most of the time Bonnie reading and Courtland devouring her lovely face with his eyes from behind a sheltering hand, watching every varying expression, noting the straight, delicate brow, the beautiful eyes filled with holy things as they lifted now and then in the reading; marveling over the sweetness of the voice.

THE second day of his visit Courtland had made an errand with Bonnie to town to send off several telegrams. As a result a lot of things arrived for him the day before Christmas, marked "Rush!" They were smuggled into the parlor, behind the Christmas tree, with great secrecy after dark by Bonnie and Courtland, and covered with the buffalo robes from the car till morning. There was a big leather chair with air-cushions for Father Marshall; its mate in lady's size for Mother; a set of encyclopedias that he had heard Father say he wished he had; a lot of silver forks and spoons for Mother, who had apologized for the silver being rubbed off of some of hers. There were two sets of books in wonderful leather bindings that he had heard Bonnie say she longed to read, and there was the tiniest little gold watch, about which he had been in terrible doubt ever since he had sent for it. Suppose Bonnie should think it wrong to accept it when she had known him so short a time! How was he going to make her see that it was all right? He couldn't tell her she was a sort of a sister of his, for he didn't want her for a sister. He puzzled over that question whenever he had time, which wasn't often, because he was so busy and so happy every minute.

Then there were great five-pound boxes of chocolates, glacéd nuts and bonbons, and a crate of foreign fruits, with nuts, raisins, figs, and dates. There was a long, deep box from the nearest city filled with the most wonderful hothouse blossoms: roses, lilies, sweetpeas, violets, gardenias, and even orchids. Courtland had never enjoyed spending money so much in all his life. He only wished he could get back to the city for a couple of hours and buy a lot more things.

TO paint the picture of Mother Marshall when she sat on her new air-cushions and counted her spoons and forks—real silver forks beyond all her dreamings! —to show Father Marshall, as he wiped his spectacles and bent, beaming, over the encyclopedias or rested his gray head back against the cushions! Ah! That would be the work of an artist who could catch the glory that shines deeper than faces and reaches souls! As for Courtland, he was too much taken up watching Bonnie's face when she opened her books, looking deep into her eyes as she looked up from the little velvet case where the watch ticked softly into her wondering ears; seeing the breathlessness with which she lifted the flowers from their bed among the ferns and placed them reverently in jars and pitchers around the room.

It was a wonderful Christmas! The first real Christmas Courtland had ever known. Sitting in the dim firelight between dusk and darkness, watching Bonnie at the piano, listening to the tender Christmas music she was playing, joining his sweet tenor in with her clear soprano now and then, Courtland suddenly thought of Tennelly, off at Palm Beach, doing the correct thing in wedding trips with Gila. Poor Tennelly! How little he would be getting of the real joy of Christmas! How little he would understand the wonderful peace that settled down in the heart of his friend when, later, they all knelt in the firelight, and Father Marshall prayed, as if he were talking to One who stood there close beside him, whose companionship had been a life experience.

THERE were so many pictures that Courtland had to carry back with him to the seminary. Bonnie in the kitchen, with a long-sleeved high-necked gingham apron on, frying doughnuts or baking waffles. Bonnie at the organ on Sunday in the little church in town, or sitting in a corner of the Sunday school room surrounded by her seventeen boys, with her Bible open on her lap, and in her face the light of heaven, while the boys watched and listened, too intent to know that they were doing it. Bonnie throwing snowballs from behind the snow fort he built her. Bonnie with the wonderful mystery upon her when they talked about the little watch and whether she might keep it. Bonnie in her window-seat with one of the books he had given her, the morning he started to go out with Father Marshall and see what was the matter with the automobile, and then came back to his room unexpectedly after his knife and caught a glimpse of her through the open door.

And that last one on the platform of Sloan's Station, waving him a smiling good-by!

Courtland had torn himself away at last, with a promise that he would return the minute his work was over, and with the consolation that Bonnie was going to write to him. They had arranged to pursue a course of study together. The future opened up rosily before him. How was it that skies had ever looked dark, that he had thought his ideals vanished, and womanhood a lost art when the world held this one pearl of a girl? Bonnie! Rose Bonnie!

CHAPTER XXXI

THE rest of the winter sped away quickly. Courtland was very happy. Pat looked at him enviously sometimes, yet he was content to have it so. Pat had long ago discovered that there was a girl at Stephen Marshall's old home, and he sat wisely quiet and rejoiced. What kind of a girl he could only imagine from Courtland's rapt look when he received a letter, and from the exquisite photograph that presently took its place on Courtland's desk. Mother Marshall had invited Pat to come out with Courtland in the spring and spend a week, and Pat was going. Pat had something to confess to Mother Marshall.

Courtland went out twice that summer, once for a week as soon as his classes were over. It was then that Bonnie promised to marry him.

Mother Marshall had a lot of sense and took a great liking to Pat. One day she took him up in Stephen's room and told him all about Stephen's boyhood. Pat, great, big baby giant that he was, knelt down beside her chair, put his face in her lap, and blurted out the tale of how he had led the mob against Stephen and been indirectly the cause of his death.

Mother Marshall heard him through with tears of compassion running down her cheeks. It was not quite news to her, for Courtland had told her something of the tale, without any names, when he had confessed that he held the garments of those who did the persecuting.

"There, there!" said Mother Marshall, patting the big fellow's dark head. "You never knew what you were doing, laddie! My Steve always wanted a chance to prove that he was brave. When he was just a little fellow and read about the martyrs, he used to say: 'Would I have that much nerve, mother? A fellow never can tell till he's been tested!' And so I'm not sorry he had his chance to stand up before you all for what he thought was right. Did you see my boy's face, too, when he died?"

"Yes," said Pat, lifting his head earnestly. "I'd just picked up a little kid he sent up to the fire-escape, and saw his face all lit up by the fire. It looked like the face of an angel! Then I saw him lift up his hands and look up like he saw somebody above, and he called out something with a sort of smile, as if he was saying he'd be up there pretty soon! And then—he fell!"

THE tears were raining down Mother Marshall's cheeks by now, but there was a smile of triumph in her eyes.

"He wanted to be a missionary, my Stephen did, only he was afraid he wouldn't be able to preach. He always was shy before folks. But I guess he preached his sermon!" She sighed contentedly.

"He sure did!" said Pat. "I never forgot that look on his face, nor the way he took our roughneck insults. None of the fellows did. It made a big impression on us all. And when Court began to change, came out straight and said he believed in Christ, and all that, it knocked the tar out of us all. Stephen hasn't got done preaching yet. You ought to hear Court tell the story of his death. It bowled me over when I heard it, and everywhere he tells it men believe! Wherever Paul Courtland tells that story Stephen Marshall will be preaching."

Mother Marshall stooped over and kissed Pat's astonished forehead. "You have made me a proud and happy mother today, laddie! I'm glad you came."

Pat, suddenly conscious of himself, stumbled, blushing, to his feet: "Thanks, Mother! It's been great! Believe me, I shan't ever forget it. It's been like looking into heaven for this poor bum. If I'd had a home like this I might have stood some chance of being like your Steve, instead of just a roughneck athlete."

"Yes, I know," smiled Mother Marshall. "A dear, splendid roughneck, doing a big work with the boys! Paul has told me all about it. You're preaching a lot of sermons yourself, you know, and going to preach some more. Now shall we go down? It's time for evening prayers."

SO Pat put his strong arm around Mother Marshall's plump waist, drew one of her hands in his, and together they walked down to the parlor, where Bonnie was already playing "Rock of Ages." It seemed to Pat the kingdom of heaven could be no sweeter, for this was the kingdom come on earth. When he and Courtland were up-stairs in their room, and all the house quiet for the night, Pat spoke:

"I've sized it up this way, Court. There ain't any dying! That's only an imaginary line like the equator on the map. It's heaven or hell, both now and hereafter! We can begin heaven right now if we want to, and live it on through; and that's what these folks have done. You don't hear them sitting here fighting like the professors used to do, about whether there's a heaven or a hell! They know there's both. They're living in one and pulling folks out of the other, hard as they can; and they're too busy, following out the Bible and seeing it prove itself, to listen to all the twaddle to prove that it ain't so! I sure am glad you gave me the tip and I got a chance to get in on this little old game, for it's the best game I know, and the best part about it is it lasts forever!"

Tennelly was away all that summer, doing the fashionable summer resorts and taking a California trip. The next winter he spent in Washington. Uncle Ramsey had him at work, and Courtland ran on him in his office once, when he took a hurried trip down to see what he could do for the eight-hour bill. Tennelly looked grave and sad. He was touchingly glad to see Courtland. They did not speak of Gila once, but when Courtland lay in his sleepless sleeper on the return trip that night Tennelly's face haunted him, the wistfulness in it.

A FEW months later Tennelly wrote a brief note announcing the birth of a daughter, named Doris Ramsey after his grandmother. The tône of his letter seemed more cheerful.

Courtland was so happy that winter he could scarcely contain himself. Pat had great times kidding him about the Western mail. Courtland was supplying a vacant church down in the old factory district in the city, and Pat often went along. On one of these Sunday afternoons late in the spring they were walking down a street they did not often take, and suddenly Courtland stopped with an exclamation of dismay and looked up at a great blaring sign wired on a big old-fashioned church:

CHURCH OF GOD

was the startling statement.

Pat looked up at the sign and then at Courtland's face, figuring out, as he usually could, what was the matter with Court.

"It's terrible!" said Courtland.

"H'm!" said Pat, again. "Whose fault do you s'pose it is? Not God's. Somebody fell down on his job, I reckon! Congregation gone to the devil, very likely!"

"Wait!" said Courtland, gravely. "I must find out."

He stepped into a little store and asked some questions. "You were right, Pat," he said, when he came out. "The congregation has gone to the devil. They have moved up into the more fashionable part of town, and the church is for sale. There's only one member of the old church left down here. I'm going around to see him. Pat, that sign mustn't stay up there! It's a disgrace to God."

"What could you do about it?" Pat was puzzled.

"Do about it? Why, man, I can buy it if there isn't any other way!"

Progress of the War

By ANTHONY ARNOUX

THERE has been but little fighting during the past week on the western front. Nevertheless great activity in raiding their opponents' lines displayed by the Teutons is taken by the most competent observers of the great struggle to indicate an intention to launch an offensive on a large scale.

For several reasons this view is perhaps correct. The end of the war, temporarily at least, on the Russian front has permitted the Germans to transfer many hundred thousand men, all trained and war-hardened troops, from this Russian front to the western. As a result, for the first time in years, perhaps even since the first three weeks of the war, Germany will have, when these transfers are completed, an army in the west almost numerically equal or possibly even superior to the forces of the Allies. Every day brings us tidings from widely scattered sources of information that troop and munition movements on an enormous scale to the western front are taking place.

The British are considerably concerned over their recent reverse to the west of Cambrai. As a result of a campaign by the London Times, the British government, through General Maurice, has announced that a sweeping investigation of the whole matter will be made at once.

ON December 11 General Allenby, the commander-in-chief of the British army operating in Palestine, made his official entry into Jerusalem as noted on page 1369 of this issue.

The U-boats, according to the British Admiralty report, had about an average week. Fourteen vessels over 1,600 tons were lost and seven under.

The interior Russian situation remains disturbed. The Constituent Assembly, the body charged with the organization of the new government and the drawing up of a constitution, met on Tuesday, December 11. In this body, which consists of some 650 delegates elected from the whole of Russia, no one political party seems to have a majority, though the Bolsheviki appear to be the strongest. In southeastern Russia, a counter revolution under the leadership of the Hetman of the Don Cossacks, General Kaledines, has really been organized and has seized several important towns. General Korniloff, whose escape from prison is confirmed, has joined this movement. The Bolsheviki government sent troops to combat this movement; conflicting rumors have given victory to both sides in fighting that occurred. Southeastern Russia contains the Donetz mining and industrial districts, and is also the grain-growing section of the country.

There have also been reports, later denied, that Japanese troops had landed at Vladivostok, and also that Chinese troops were moving on Harbin, Manchuria.

THE British and French troops which arrived on the Italian front the latter part of last week have been assigned to their positions, the British on the Montello ridge on the west bank of the Piave, a little south of Vidor, while the French troops, which are mostly chasseurs, Alpins and mountain artillery, have been placed farther north, along the Monte Grappa ridge, between the Piave and the Brenta, on the northern portion of the line. Early in the present week there was very severe fighting northeast of Asiago, wherein the Teutons captured Monte Cismone, just south of Gallio, the point commanding the entrance to the Val Frenzela. This valley runs southeast from the Asiago plateau to Vastagna on the Brenta River, and through it the Italians on the plateau or in its region have been receiving their supplies and reinforcements. Since this early fighting the week has been uneventful. Snow is beginning to fall heavily in the mountains, which the Italians consider will be to their advantage. On the lower reaches of the Piave, there has been no infantry fighting of a serious character.

Howard Chandler Christy "When Sammy Comes Marching Home"

Have these beautiful pictures in your home

HAVE this great sailor painting by Mr. Riesenberg. See Mr. Christy's painting of the time our Marines shall march victoriously up our streets again. See the sad, brave leave-taking of Haskell Coffin's soldier and sweetheart. Thrill over our daring Aviation Corps as does the charming girl in Mr. Eckhardt's picture.

This is the finest calendar of all the famous Swift series, for in these splendid paintings the strong national feeling of the hour has inspired four of our country's greatest artists.

Paintings beautifully reproduced in colors

On the back of each picture are dozens of facts you want to know—how to recognize a lieutenant when you see one, a captain, a major, an ensign, and to what branch of the service he belongs. Wigwag signals—how to give warning of the enemy's approach. The different types of battleships, cruisers, torpedo boats, submarines. And the greatest wonder of the Great War—the airplanes—monoplanes—biplanes.

Each picture is ten and a half inches high, the whole calendar fifteen inches. There is no advertising on the front. The beauty of this calendar will delight you. Send for it today.

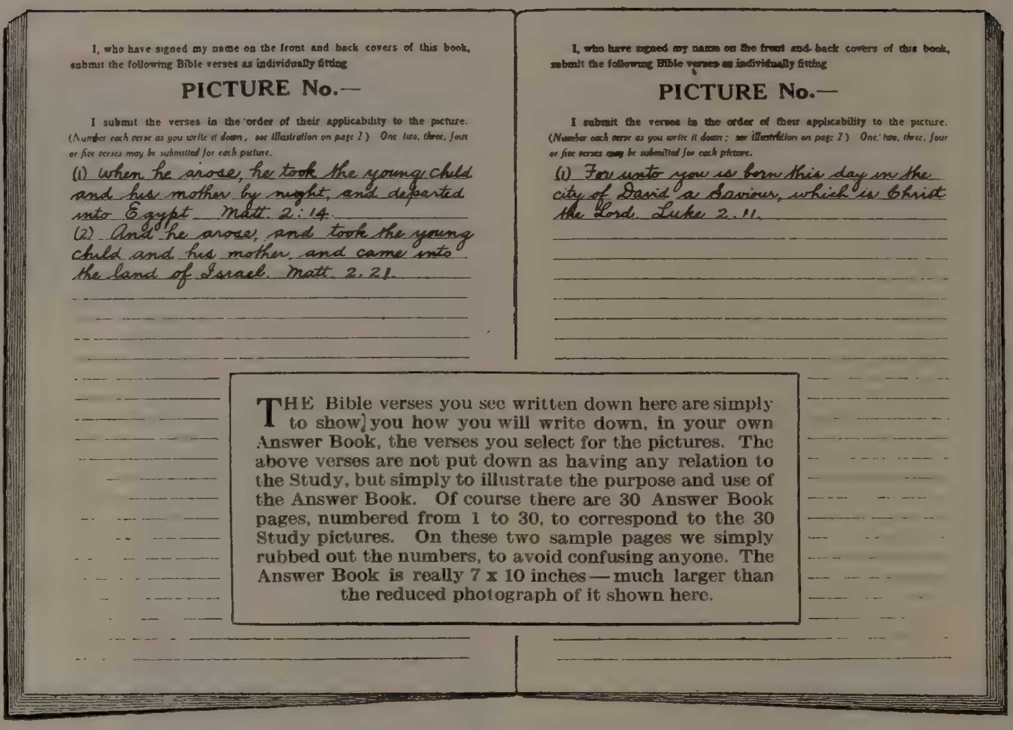
THIS is the Answer Book, in which you will write down the Bible verses you choose as best fitting the 30 pictures in the National Bible Picture Study—just as these example verses (which are not put down as having any relation to the Study itself) are written here. Those who write a good hand will have no advantage over those who are not such fine penmen.



I, who have signed my name on the front and back covers of this book, submit the following Bible verses as individually fitting

PICTURE No.—

I submit the verses in the order of their applicability to the picture. (Number each verse as you write it down, see illustration on page 2) One two, three, four or five verses may be submitted for each picture.

(1) When he arose, he took the young child and his mother by night, and departed into Egypt. Matt. 2:14.
(2) And he arose, and took the young child and his mother, and came into the land of Israel. Matt. 2. 21.

I, who have signed my name on the front and back covers of this book, submit the following Bible verses as individually fitting

PICTURE No.—

I submit the verses in the order of their applicability to the picture. (Number each verse as you write it down; see illustration on page 2) One, two, three, four or five verses may be submitted for each picture.

(1) For unto you is born this day in the city of David a Saviour, which is Christ the Lord. Luke 2. 11.

THE Bible verses you see written down here are simply to show you how you will write down, in your own Answer Book, the verses you select for the pictures. The above verses are not put down as having any relation to the Study, but simply to illustrate the purpose and use of the Answer Book. Of course there are 30 Answer Book pages, numbered from 1 to 30, to correspond to the 30 Study pictures. On these two sample pages we simply rubbed out the numbers, to avoid confusing anyone. The Answer Book is really 7 x 10 inches — much larger than the reduced photograph of it shown here.

IN looking closely at the 30 Study pictures, in choosing and reading carefully the Bible verse that in your opinion fits each picture best, and then in writing each selected verse down in the Answer Book, you will complete the process of making that verse yours forever—you will remember it, word for word, all your life long!

HOW FAMILIAR ARE YOU WITH YOUR BIBLE —WHEN IT IS CLOSED?

Can you see how the National Bible Picture Study will in its interesting way write lastingly upon your memory every verse you take up—so that at will the verse will be recalled to ready speech? When called upon in assemblages, you will have a fund of Scripture to give your hearers; in hours of misfortune the divine words will come back to you; in times of need you will be able to repeat their sustaining promises.

A Better Knowledge

I surely have a better knowledge of the location of many events, Books, etc., of my Bible than I had before. Also a much larger general knowledge of the Bible.

H. M., Kentucky.

A Blessing

I want to thank you for my renewed study of the Bible· I now turn to any book, and to passages and verses with ease, that before I began in this contest I would have to look some time to find. I have always read my Bible, and love it. This contest though has revealed parts to me that had escaped my notice before. It seems in looking so closely at the pictures I have found so much more than reading a chapter as a chapter. I know it has been a blessing to me and others. S. E. A., Missouri.

Never at a Loss Now

When, at church meetings, or prayer meetings, we are expected to quote a verse from the Bible I am no more at a loss for an appropriate one, as I have unconsciously memorized many. S. P. K., Mississippi.

Better Than a Year of Reading

I have read the Bible through ten times, taking a year to go through it, but the Study contests help to make one more familiar with the Bible than simply reading it through in a year, and hope we shall have more of them.

Mrs. S. A. G., New York.

Has Gained a Prize

.I cannot refrain from telling you what joy I have in searching verses to suit the pictures. I find too that since I entered the contest I pay more attention to the reading of the Scripture lesson in church. I cannot help it. When the pastor reads a verse contained in the Gems book I know it. So if I fail to win one of the cash prizes I will have gained a precious prize in Gems of Truth stored in my brain. I. G. W., Pennsylvania.

So many happy people have found new inspiration and increased Bible knowledge in past Studies—won't you now join the greatest one, in which

$5,000.00 in Cash Will Be Awarded

First prize is $1,000.00 cash, second $750.00 cash, third $500.00 cash, and there are 1,001 prizes in all—each in cash. You may gain a great cash prize—you must gain what each participant will receive: the precious reward which is in the truth and promise of the Bible.

Read every one of the remarkable letters on this page from participants in former Bible Picture Studies. Here is, indeed, Bible study that seems a pastime, yet implants alike in heart and memory the glorious phrases of the Holy Book. Too many of us have but a hazy familiarity with the Bible—we should be able to repeat its most significant portions from memory.

Let your speech be always with grace, seasoned with salt, that ye may know how ye ought to answer every man. Col. 4 : 6.

Imprinted Upon Her Mind

I enjoyed working it out very much. By the careful reading necessary I found so many new and beautiful things that I had never appreciated before—not only found them, but they have been impressed upon my mind in such a way that I shall always have them. H. S., Ohio.

Greater Insight Gained

Allow me to express my gratitude to you for making possible the real enjoyment which I derived from my part in the contest just closed. The Word of God has been for years precious to me and this plan of referring so constantly and comparing different passages has begotten a familiarity with and an insight into the Scriptures not otherwise acquired. "My word shall not return unto me void" is well applied to the good work you are doing.

M. L. B., New York.

Misses the Study

I write to tell you how I miss the Bible Picture Study. It seems like something very important has come to a close. I surely did enjoy fitting the pictures with answers. It brought to my memory the Bible stories I learned when a child. I also learned many texts over again. J. F. S., Calif.

Indelibly Stamped Upon the Memory

I want to tell you how much the Bible Picture Study has interested and benefited me. In four months I shall have passed my seventy-seventh anniversary. From a spell of the grippe, as well as old age, my memory became very much impaired. But now the walls of memory are hung with scenes and verses that I shall never forget, for they are indelibly stamped thereon. I wish very much we could have at least one picture to study each week, through the remaining days of my life. Mrs. E. H., Washington, D. C.

Ask the Christian Herald

By MARGARET E. SANGSTER

NOW at the holiday time of year, when folk are giving gifts, the Christian Herald has a gift to present to its readers—a gift that will last not only through the Christmas season but through the entire year.

There are doubtless many things that you would like to know about; many questions that you have no way of solving. Perhaps you want advice about furnishing your home, or how to copyright a book, or how to take precautions against typhoid fever, or how to get rid of flies. Perhaps, if you are a housewife, you would like to know how to make cake without butter and eggs, or how to get a good servant, or how to take the starch from potatoes. Perhaps you would like information about things political, or about the natural resources of our land, or about the great war. Perhaps you would like a course of study outlined for you, or a list of good fiction for home reading.

The Christian Herald's Christmas gift to you, friends of the Christian Herald, is a great and useful gift. It is the gift of information, of answers to your questions, of help when you most need it. For the Christian Herald has established a FREE INFORMATION BUREAU in Washington for the permanent use of its readers. This bureau will be glad to give you reliable information in answer to almost any question you choose to ask, except on matters of religion.

A mother wrote to me last week. "My children," she said to me, "are reading the wrong sort of books. I want them to get a knowledge of real values, a knowledge that they can only acquire from books with a deep spiritual motive back of them. What books, of this sort and with enough interest to hold them, can I obtain?"

And a teacher-girl, tired of her work and longing for the great out-of-doors, sent me a letter that began, "I want to go out on a ranch and earn my living! I want to live away from cities. How and where and when can I settle a claim, and make my dream come true?"

And a boy, filled with the spirit that is sending men, khaki-clad, across a great sea to fight a nation's battles, asked anxiously, yesterday: "What sort of tests do I have to take to get in the aviation department of our army?"

Questions like these are the sort of questions that the Christian Herald's Free Information Bureau will be glad to answer—questions like these and many other questions. Perhaps there is something that you want to know?

The Bureau of Information has been established in Washington rather than elsewhere because of the tremendous resources of information and service that have been accumulated there by the Federal government — resources of which the average citizen has no adequate conception, and which he does not know how to reach.

Besides information the Bureau will be glad, all through the year, to mail various special pamphlets and booklets to those who want them. This service will be quite without cost except for an enclosed stamp—to be used as return postage. This stamp must, of course, be enclosed with any query that needs a reply.

WHILE such free offerings will be mainly in pamphlet form, now, at the opening of the New Year, the Christian Herald has decided to begin its new service by offering each of its readers a free Art Calendar. Throughout the coming year this Calendar may serve as a reminder of the establishment of the Christian Herald Information Bureau, and its readiness to serve Herald readers.

The free Art Calendar is published by the United States Navy Department. It bears a reproduction of a striking and beautiful painting depicting the Spirit of Liberty, who points the way to an American seaman bearing the Stars and Stripes. This Calendar is one which will be welcome in every American home, at a time when our Navy has actually followed the pointing finger of Liberty across danger-laden seas. The size of the Calendar is 6x10 inches.

Like all the services of the new Information Bureau, this Calendar may be secured by any reader of the Christian Herald on sending a stamp to cover return postage. A 2-cent stamp is sufficient to cover postage on the Calendar. If inquiries are sent to the Information Bureau which must be answered in sealed envelope, a 3-cent stamp for return postage is necessary.

Send for a copy of the Navy Calendar today. Simply fill in your name and address on the attached coupon, and mail with a 2-cent stamp to the Christian Herald Information Bureau, Frederic J. Haskin, Director, Washington, D. C.

Young People's Topics for January 6

Christian Duty and Privilege. (2) Becoming a Christian

Christian Endeavor and B. Y. P. U. Topics. Acts 16 : 13–15 (Consecration Meeting)

FOR centuries men sought the way of life. Then, on a starlit night, came the angel-heralded Babe of Bethlehem. Thirty-three years later, on a cross-crowned hill, Jesus, who in his life and ministry had declared the Father, became the Eternal Sacrifice for human sin, and from his opened tomb came forth the risen Saviour. Through him we have access to the Father; in him God is made manifest; in following him we find the way of life. One thing is asked of us who follow him. It is full confession of our sinfulness and full acceptance of his sacrifice. He died for us. We owe it to ourselves to accept his sacrifice, but salvation is our privilege. When we are his, and his love has taken in our hearts the room of sin, then we find duty awaiting us. It is no idle thing to be a Christian. Christ did not die for us alone. He died for all mankind. Once we accept his sacrifice and know him through his Spirit, we too, receive his great commission to "go and disciple all nations." There is work to do. Some of it is fitted to our hands; for more of it his Spirit waits to prepare our hearts and our abilities. Beyond the mourners' bench lies the altar of service. "Saved for service" should be our daily song and practice. Service is our duty, but service rendered in his name becomes our privilege.

Our Need of Guidance (Morning Watch)

Epworth League Topic. Ex. 33 : 14, 15; Ps. 32 : 8; Isa. 58 : 11; Ps. 41 : 14

FOOLHARDY indeed is the captain who tries to navigate a foreign roadstead without a native pilot. Equally foolhardy is he who seeks to thread the intricate passages of life in his own strength and wisdom. God has promised to be an eye to us. He has promised to guide us through every day and hour, through every dark and dangerous lane of human life. He has promised, moreover, if we will follow, not only to keep us from bodily harm but to satisfy our souls. Clear across the continent we have a road marked with red, white, and blue signs, and called the "Lincoln Highway." It is easy to follow, for we have but to watch for the signs. The spiritual road of life is just as clearly marked. In every page of God's Word we find its guide-posts. Verse after verse says, this is the Way of Life. But the red, white, and blue signs of the great highway are of little use to one sightless or color-blind. And some are strangely blind in spiritual things. For such, the key to the guide-book is sincere prayer to the Father for grace to understand his Word. Thus prayer and the open Book together make certain our steps. What better time to use these guides than in the morning, when the day is new and all our possible mistakes as yet unmade? Keep the morning watch, go to your knees and your open Book, before the driving cares of the day press on you, and rise with new strength, purer purpose and clearer vision for the day.

"Whose Fan Is in His Hand"

AFTER threshing, the next process is to separate the wheat from the chaff. This is done by the aid of the gentle breezes that usually arise during the evening hours, no matter how warm the summer day may have been.

The tools are very simple. A two-pronged fork, converted from a single limb of an oak tree, is used to move the long straw, and with this the worker stirs the grain during the process of treading it out. For the winnowing a fork, also made of oak wood, but with five flat prongs, is used. This is the implement referred to as the "fan," of which we read in sacred story. A wooden shovel also plays its part.

The photograph printed on the first page was made at the threshing-floor of Beit Sahur, a small village lying eastward at the foot of the mountain whereon is built Bethlehem, and is what might be called its agricultural suburb. In the broad level valley beyond, we see the shepherds' fields where the angels, the first Christmas Eve, appeared to men in the lowliest walks of life. Here Boaz must have had his fields, for they are the only large ones near to Bethlehem suitable for raising grain, and such as would be in the possession of "a mighty man of wealth," as Boaz is depicted as being.

In this land of no change, or at least slow change, it is quite conceivable that on and around these very threshing-floors shown in the photograph, with the same appearance of life in olden times as now, centered one of the Bible's most charming stories.

"Rice" Converts or Real?

ARE the fourteen thousand foreign missionaries in the Orient doing what you sent them to do? Or are their converts professing Christianity for the sake of rice and clothes?

These questions are authoritatively answered by a man who knows the Orient. Tyler Dennett, Editorial Secretary of the Methodist Episcopal Board of Foreign Missions, has written a remarkable article that tells the truth about the work of our missionaries.

It appears in the January issue of ASIA, the magazine that is giving the people of America the knowledge they must have about the Orient.

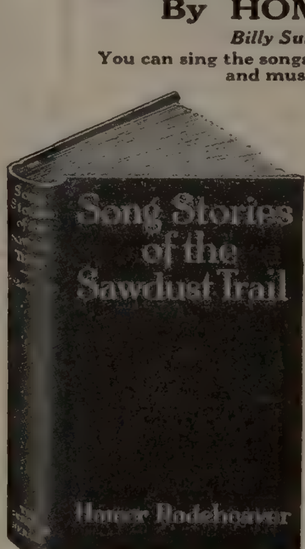
Song Stories of the Sawdust Trail
By HOMER RODEHEAVER

Billy Sunday's Tabernacle Choir Leader

You can sing the songs, for Rody's book gives them all in full, words and music, ready for the piano or organ.



DWIGHT L. MOODY, the greatest evangelist of his day, used to say of Sankey's singing: "It is a question in my mind whether Ira's songs don't win more souls than my preaching."

Homer Rodeheaver, who, as everybody knows, is Billy Sunday's choir leader, and who has a wonderful gift like that of Sankey, has written a book with the attractive title "Song Stories of the Sawdust Trail."

"Rody" in his book tells the story of his most famous songs—of which the words and music are familiar to hundreds of thousands of Americans who have listened with eagerness and delight to his singing and who have joined in the choruses. And each song has an individual history of its own. He tells how a humble, homekeeping woman, striving to "do something" for God, made herself and multitudes of others happy by writing four simple, touching verses which the world knows as "Brighten the Corner Where You Are," and which radiate the finest kind of practical Christian teaching. "Molly and the Baby," another of Rody's favorites, won a poor struggling drunkard back from his cups, and his evil associations, to his wife and family.

There are many other songs, each of which Rodeheaver invests with a history of its own. Among them are "Counting the Cost," "If Your Heart Keeps Right," "Mother's Prayers," "Sweeter As the Years Go By," and "I Walk With the King." One that has a unique history is "The Brewers' Big Horses"—the simplest and homeliest of the lot, and the most amusing. You'll laugh with delight at the story.

We will send a copy of "Song Stories of the Sawdust Trail," postpaid, together with the Christian Herald for one year, for $2.40

Or, we will send a copy to present subscribers as a reward for sending us one new yearly subscription to the Christian Herald with $2.00

ALL WOOL
and a Yard Wide.

That's the slogan of honest quality and quantity whether the commodity is wool or the measure is a yard.

Whatever you buy if it's all wool and a yard wide it's as good as it ought to be and as much as you pay for.

The important thing is, who says it's all wool and a yard wide?

When Christian Herald advertisers say it, it's so. The Christian Herald investigates the sincerity of its advertisers and the truthfulness of their claims probably more carefully than any other magazine.

They—and what they sell—are all wool and a yard wide.

You may be sure of that because we are.

John Prepares the Way for Jesus

International Sunday School Lesson for January 6
Mark 1:1-11

The Gospel of Mark

By Rev. GEORGE D. ALLISON, Ph. D.

WE begin with the new year an entirely new cycle of Improved International lessons. The first series covers the first and simplest of our four Gospels, "According to Mark." For the first time, the course includes every chapter and every verse of the book.

I strongly urge you, before teaching the first chapter, to read the complete book through at one sitting, and begin by trying to imagine yourself an early Christian, reading it for the first time. Its power and beauty will dawn on you as never before.

Mark's style is highly distinctive. In the first place Mark's favorite word is "straightway," which occurs no less than forty-two times in this short history. (The Authorized Version obscures this by translating it variously, so in this case the Revised Version more nearly reduplicates Mark's style.) There is only one long connected discourse (Mark 13) and only four parables. The sayings of the Christ and, above all, his deeds are vividly and rapidly given. There is a swing to the narrative that gives an impression of the brevity and earnestness of Jesus' public work.

As scholars are now agreed, this Gospel was the first written, and became the basis of Matthew and Luke, who added the further parables and sayings which they received from other sources. There are only about thirty verses which are not found in the first or third Gospel.

The Author and His Story

All ancient traditions point to Peter as the source of the second Gospel, and to John Mark as the writer. Evidently Mark was a Jew of liberal views and Roman leanings. Every one remembers how his hesitancy on a memorable occasion displeased Paul, and how afterward they were reconciled and worked together again.

Mark wrote for the Gentile world. His language was the popular Greek, then universally used, but it has a distinctly Latin setting, and may even have been written in Rome. He carefully explains Jewish customs and Aramaic words for his hearers. The date of his work was about 65 A. D.

I strongly urge consideration of the book as a whole for the first lesson in any but the youngest classes. We shall have a better six months' work as a result. The first chapter is familiar and was studied a year ago in John's parallel account.

Yet by no means fail to read the introduction. Mark plunges into his story and in a paragraph gets before us the work of John the Baptist, and the picture of the mature Christ on the threshold of his career. Evidently Mark was not so much concerned as the other synoptics with the infancy and preparation of the Master. Perhaps he had heard little of these matters. But he does put forth plainly the story of the Herald of the Messiah. We may review that story now. Consider that rugged, stern man whose prophetic voice shook Israel and formed a natural prelude to the ministry of the Lord. Recall his twofold message: Repentance and Expectancy. Each is an element of all genuine prophecy—a vigorous denunciation of sin and a wistful, divine hope for the future. Some one has called him the last Hebrew prophet. He looks around him with indignation and does what he can to change men's lives. But all the time he humbly subordinates himself to God's plan, which Another shall bring to fruition in God's time. He is a reformer, but he realizes that his task is only preparatory to the positive and constructive work of the Spirit. He is but a voice, but he is the herald of a new era.

How We Can Prepare the Way

The very essence of our Christian commission is evangelistic. Yet countless Christians have never expeirenced the joy of preparing other hearts for the entrance of Christ. To each of twenty young soldiers of our church I sent this message: "Be consistently Christian; don't be preachy or nagging, but when your chance comes give a warning against flagrant wrongdoing, or an invitation to follow Christ." Isn't that applicable to all of us, whether soldiers or civilians? Well, here is a recent letter from one of these boys in camp:

> I have a friend and chum here who has neither home, father nor mother. When I first met him he was the foulest-mouthed man I ever met. I took a liking to him, and one day when he was talking to another man—every other word was an oath—I came to him and said, "Bob, what is your idea of swearing every time you speak?" He said, "Well, Bill, I have been in bad company for years, and it is no use for me to try to stop it." I persuaded him to come to church with me and read the Scriptures to him. . . . Now he hangs out with me, and is forever reading his Bible.
> I am more than glad now that I am a Christian, because I have been able to save a soul. This is communion Sunday, and Bob and I are going to church together.

The writer of this letter has a new conception of religion since he had this experience. And how wisely he worked in removing this obstacle of profanity from the spiritual life of his friend. After saying his word, he let the Bible speak, and then he brought his man to the church, where he could hear the message.

We all come into contact with profanity, or with intemperance, or with some other stumbling-block along the King's Highway. Are we doing our bit to remove them from before the weak?

Christ's Dedication to His Task

We come to baptism with repentance for our sins and dedication of our lives to the service of the Kingdom of God. Jesus did not feel any consciousness of sin or penitence. He came and insisted on being baptized, because it was for him a seal of consecration to his task. Even Christ the Lord was strengthened and inspired anew because he took this step. Do all that you can to make the act of consecration as impressive as you can when your boys and girls join the Church of Christ. Make it to be a red letter day in their lives. Let us do our part that during this year of testing there may be every month a stream of young people thronging from our Bible schools into full church membership, saying, "I believe in Jesus Christ with all my heart, and I wish to dedicate my life to the service of his Kingdom among men."

The nation is calling for an entire loyalty, an outspoken Americanism. Let the church sound the challenge to whole-hearted discipleship, an outspoken Christianity. The New Year affords an opportunity for every believer in Jesus to ally himself with the Church of Christ, which is the enrolled army of the Kingdom. Enlist—now—for a life of service.

ISAIAH 61 The Mission of the Lord's Anointed One

22 A [b] little one shall become a thousand, and a small one a strong nation: I the LORD will hasten it in his time.

CHAPTER 61

The Redeemer Comes to Zion with Blessings.

THE [a] Spirit of the Lord GOD is upon me; because the LORD hath anointed me to preach good tidings unto the meek; he hath sent me [b] to bind up the broken-hearted, to proclaim [c] liberty to the captives, and the opening of the prison to them that are bound; ★

2 To [d] proclaim the acceptable year of the LORD, and [e] the day of vengeance of our God; to [f] comfort all that mourn; ★

3 To appoint unto them that mourn in Zion, [g] to give unto them beauty for ashes, the oil of joy for mourning, the garment of praise for the spirit of heaviness; that they might be called trees of righteousness, the [h] planting of the LORD, [i] that he might be glorified. ★

4 ¶ And they shall [j] build the old wastes, they shall raise up the former desolations, and they shall repair the waste cities, the desolations of many generations.

5 And [k] strangers shall stand and feed your flocks, and the sons of the alien shall be your plowmen and your vinedressers.

6 But [l] ye shall be named the Priests of the LORD: men shall call you the Ministers of our God: ye shall eat the riches of the Gentiles, and in their glory shall ye boast yourselves.

7 For [m] your shame ye shall have double; and for confusion they shall rejoice in their portion: therefore in their land they shall possess the double: everlasting joy shall be unto them.

8 For I the LORD love judgment, I hate robbery for burnt offering; and I will direct their work in truth, [n] and I will make an everlasting covenant with them.

9 And their seed shall be known among the Gentiles, and their offspring among the people: all that see them shall acknowledge them, that they are the seed which the LORD hath blessed.

10 I will greatly rejoice in the LORD, my soul shall be joyful in my God; for he hath clothed me with the garments of salvation, he hath covered me with the robe of righteousness, as [o] a bridegroom decketh [1] himself with ornaments, and as a bride adorneth herself with her jewels.

11 For as the earth bringeth forth her bud, and as the garden causeth the things that are sown in it to spring forth; so the Lord GOD will cause [p] righteousness [q] and praise to spring forth before all the nations.

CHAPTER 62

The Redeemer Calls the Watchmen to Awake.

FOR Zion's sake will I not hold my peace, and for Jerusalem's sake I will not rest, until the righteousness thereof go forth as brightness, and the salvation thereof as a lamp that burneth.

2 And the Gentiles shall see thy righteousness, and all kings thy glory: [a] and thou shalt be called by a new name, which the mouth of the LORD shall name.

3 Thou shalt also be a [b] crown of glory in the hand of the LORD, and a royal diadem in the hand of thy God.

4 Thou [c] shalt no more be termed Forsaken; neither shall thy land any more be termed [1] Desolate: but thou shalt be called [2] Hephzibah, and thy land [3] Beulah: for the LORD delighteth in thee, and thy land shall be married.

5 For as a young man marrieth a virgin, so shall thy sons marry thee: and [4] as the bridegroom rejoiceth over the bride, so shall thy God rejoice over thee.

6 ¶ I [d] have set watchmen upon thy walls, O Jerusalem, which shall never hold their peace day nor night: [5] ye that make mention of the LORD, keep not silence,

7 And give him no [6] rest, till he establish, and till he make Jerusalem [e] a praise in the earth.

8 The LORD hath sworn by his right hand, and by the arm of his strength, [7] Surely I will no more give [f] thy corn to be meat for thine enemies; and the sons of the stranger shall not drink thy wine, for the which thou hast labored:

9 But they that have gathered it shall eat it, and praise the LORD; and they that have brought it to-

Jesus Baptized; he Undergoes Temptation

and his meat was locusts and wild [i] honey.

5 ¶ Then went out to him Jerusalem, and all Judea, and all the region round about Jordan,

6 And [j] were baptized of him in Jordan, confessing their sins.

7 But when he saw many of the Pharisees and Sadducees come to his baptism, he said unto them, O generation of vipers, who hath warned you to flee from [k] the wrath to come?

8 Bring forth therefore fruits meet for [1] repentance:

9 And think not to say within yourselves, [l] We have Abraham to our father: for I say unto you, that God is able of these stones to raise up children unto Abraham.

10 And now also the axe is laid unto the root of the trees: [m] therefore every tree which bringeth not forth good fruit is hewn down, and cast into the fire.

11 I [n] indeed baptize you with water unto repentance: but he that cometh after me is mightier than I, whose shoes I am not worthy to bear: [o] he shall baptize you with the Holy Ghost, and with fire:

12 Whose fan is in his hand, and he will thoroughly [p] purge his floor, and gather his wheat into the garner; but he will [q] burn up the chaff with unquenchable fire.

13 ¶ Then cometh Jesus [r] from Galilee to Jordan unto John, to be baptized of him.

14 But John forbade him, saying, I have need to be baptized of thee, and comest thou to me?

15 And Jesus answering said unto him, Suffer it to be so now: for thus it becometh us to [s] fulfil all righteousness. Then he suffered him.

16 And [t] Jesus, when he was baptized, went up straightway out of the water: and, lo, the heavens were opened unto him, and he saw the [u] Spirit of God descending like a dove, and lighting upon him:

17 And [v] lo a voice from heaven, saying, [w] This is my beloved Son, in whom I am well pleased.

CHRISTIAN HERALD RED LETTER BIBLES AND TESTAMENTS

Our Red Letter Bible—Only Genuine Edition

The only genuine edition of the Red Letter Bible is the Authorized or King James' Version, unchanged save for the variation of the color in the type. Two colors (Red and Black) are employed, in accordance with the simple plan devised by the late Dr. Louis Klopsch, the Originator of the Red Letter principle applied to the Holy Scriptures.

What Is a Red Letter Bible?

1. In the Old Testament the passages quoted by our Lord, or directly related to incidents to which he referred, are Printed in Red.
2. In the New Testament, the words universally accepted as those of the Saviour are Printed in Red.
3. A Red Star (★) immediately following a verse in the Old Testament indicates that the verse embodies a prophetic reference to Christ as the coming Messiah.

The Christian Herald Red Letter Bible, illustrated above, Contains Full References; also a Concordance, Subject Index, and Dictionary—all under One Alphabetical Arrangement—together with Helps, Maps, and Numerous Illustrations.

The text is set in Bold-Face Minion, especially designed for this work. There are 268 pages of Helps or Concordance and 17 superb Maps. This gem of a Bible, small in bulk, light in weight, very legible and very durable, weighs only 20 ounces. It is bound in American Levant, overlapping edges, red-under-gold, and makes altogether the handiest and most satisfactory Bible now on the market. We send this superb Bible, together with The Christian Herald for one whole year, for . . . . $$4^{50}$

Or, we will send it to old subscribers as a reward for sending us two NEW yearly subscriptions to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD with $2.00 for each.

Genuine Morocco, Calf Lined

If you can afford to pay $1 more, ask for the same Bible bound in Genuine Morocco, Calf Finish, Leather Lining, Silk Sewed, which will wear a Lifetime.

It is Sent with THE CHRISTIAN HERALD for one Year, FOR ONLY . . . . . $$5^{50}$

Or, we will send it to old subscribers as a reward for sending us three NEW yearly subscriptions to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD with $2.00 for each.

All Charges Prepaid in Every Instance

Christian Herald Red Letter Testament
